A STRANGE SPECTACLE

Oklahoma boomer is a title very often met with in the newspapers during the last few weeks. For the benefit of those of our readers who do not understand the term we will give a short description of this one of the strangest spectacles met with in modern times on the way of land excitement. Oklahoma is a portion of the Indian territory, forty miles wide by from fifty to [illegible] miles in length, well watered and said to be very fertile. It belonged exclusively to the Indians and no whites were allowed to own land within its borders until a week, when the American government opened it up for settlement. The day for entry upon this promised land was Monday last, when a grand rush was made across the border by thousands of settlers [illegible]

[illegible] two [illegible] and [illegible] the settlers' [illegible] homes steady made were transported [illegible] and within a few hours from [illegible] the barren waste was covered [illegible] tract of country which had [illegible] before been occupied by the tepee [illegible] dusky occupant was dotted with villages and houses and the white man overran its fertile fields. Such a wonderful scramble for land has heretofore been unknown on this continent; but it will not probably be the last. The United States is fast becoming over populous, and the territories heretofore held in sacred trust for poor "Lo" must be confiscated to satisfy the increase. When all these have been taken, what next? Will Canada, too, offer herself for the sacrifice!

The interesting letter in another column from the pen of R. W. Phipps is worthy of more than a casual perusal by farmers and owners of landed property. The question of tree protection is becoming more and more important year by year as our natural forests disappear, and Mr. Phipps, having made a special study of the matter, is in a position to command attention when his facile pen is speaking. We have not received a copy of his forestry report as yet, but will peruse it with much interest when it arrives.

Duncan Morrison, the Megantic outlaw, who has been resisting capture for some time by remaining in hiding [illegible] warm down on Sunday evening. This case of resisting arrest has created an immense amount of excitement in Montreal and [illegible]

[illegible] times in a big [illegible] to surrender, but without effect. His capture on Sunday was effected after he had fired three times at the constables, who returned the fire and wounded Morrison in the left hip. The inhabitants of Montreal will breathe easier now and Mr. Morrison will probably suffer the extreme penalty of the law.

Some [illegible] their potatoes by the middle of March, but my own experience is that that is too early. No pernicious potato bugs here yet, and we don't want them. Land that I would not have as a gift is now being taken up, mostly by Old Country people. I know Canadians would not look at it. Two years ago I got what I thought was a pretty good sickener (at the time) camping in the mountains, but tried it again in January, but ho, how it rained; yes, for a week. Provisions ran out. I had to cross a lake in a cedar trough, the seas threatening to fill and roll it over, but I got home all safe with samples of silver ore. The mountain is full of pyrites of iron. You would think the hardships would cure any one from going back, but no, must go once more, if well. This lake is situated in the heart of the mountain, the rocks on either side rising at about 80° to a height of some thousands of feet, yet the lake is full of fish. Salmon run up into it over rock and boulders; it may be said they climb up. Bears are also plentiful, but not at all sociable. Mountain sheep also live on the bare sides of the peaks and crags. The Indians make fancy mats, rugs, and blankets of their wool. Cougar, or mountain lion, live up there, but I would rather not make their acquaintance; they are a fierce looking animals when dead, and I believe their looks do not belie them. Where are all the people going to on the trains? You would think the country would soon get too full. Perhaps it is so now. Yours truly,

ESTELLE'S INFATUATION:

A NOVEL.

CHAPTER XIV.

HER ADVANCING DOOM.

Against that fatal visit to Thrift, which Estelle knew too well would be her doom, she made such resistance as was in her power.

There was no help for her. Charlie was dead; things financial at home were going rapidly from bad to worse; and there was no one to whom she could turn. Sometimes she thought of appealing to Caleb Stagg. Between the two, she would rather call him her husband than to be Anthony Harford's wife. The most miserable creature between earth and sky at this moment to be found in a decent English home was this same Estelle Clanricarde—this woman fatal to men, and therefore the enemy of her own peace—this woman obsessed and in a manner destroyed by the excess of that love of which so many pale, pining sisters have not enough to keep them alive.

The day before this dreadful visit was to take place Estelle went out alone to the Dower House. It was the first day that she had gone out since the fatal announcement of poor Charlie's death, and she had a sudden desire to see Lady Elizabeth, whom, by-the way, she had refused to see for those days of mourning.

The spring was stealing over the earth, and all the first signs and sounds of the renewed lovetime of nature was about.

She found Lady Elizabeth at home, and two friends met, as they had parted, in all confidence and affection, all trust and love, though only one of the two knew the whole truth of their joint position.

"Oh, Liese, I am so miserable!" cried Estelle, as she clung to her friend.

It was the most human and the most natural thing she had said ever since that deadly night.

"Darling, you must be!" returned Lady Elizabeth, holding her in her arms and kissing her as a young mother would kiss her sorrowing child.

"And as if I had not enough to bear, there is now this hateful man!" said Estelle, with the strange vehemence which sometimes possessed her of late—vehemence traversing her deadness like lightning piercing a thunder-cloud.

Lady Elizabeth checked the sudden quiver that came over her. She did not answer. She only pressed the poor girl yet more tenderly to her heart. Free from all the littleness of jealousy as she was, she loved Estelle the more because Anthony Harford loved her, and would if she could have made her love him in return. To call Anthony Harford "that hateful man," hurt her ears as blasphemy in its own way.

"I dare say you think me vain and horrid," continued Estelle, "for speaking of him as if I had the right to hate him. But we all know when men are in love with us and mean to make an offer. And then there is my mother—and Liese! Liese! between them both I am lost! I sometimes think I will kill myself, and so have done with the whole thing. Now that Charlie has gone, why should I live?"

"Hush, darling!" said Lady Elizabeth gently. "I cannot hear such things even from you. You must not even think them, dear, still less say them."

"Why should I live?" she repeated, sullenly, yet despairingly. "To be made the loathing wife of a man I hate? I know that mother will force me into it. If it broke my heart she would not mind, so long as I married a rich man."

"But if he sees your dislike?" said Lady Elizabeth, tentatively.

"Oh! what would he care for that?" answered Estelle, disdainfully. "He does see it—he knows it well enough! I made him feel it, and have done so almost from the first; but he is just one of those selfish, self willed savages who care only for themselves. He does not mind whether I hate him or not, so long as he gets his own way!"

"You are a little hard on him, dear," said Lady Elizabeth, always gently. "You see, when people are in love—they are—and they cannot help themselves."

Her argument was more natural than convincing or logical, but it served her turn.

"But if you are not in love with them, they ought to get over it," said Estelle, loftily. "That poor Caleb Stagg did, and so ought this man. He would if he were good, or a real gentleman."

"You do hate him!" cried Lady Elizabeth, with an accent of surprise in her voice.

"I do!" answered Estelle, emphatically; "and I always shall."

"But if you have to marry him?" asked her friend, full of compassion for both—for the man who loved in vain, for the woman who had to yield to a love she neither shared nor desired.

"I will not marry him!" said Estelle, vehemently. "I will say 'No' before the altar!"

Alas! alas! these passionate words were but the struggles of the victim—the beating of the caged bird's wings against the cruel bars. Deep down in her own heart she knew that her mother's will would overpower hers. Lady Elizabeth knew so too.

"Oh, help me, Liese!" cried this poor uncelebrated Iphigenia, burying her face on her friend's knees as she flung herself to the ground and clasped her flexible waist with her trembling hands.

"How can I, dear!—how can I!" said Lady Elizabeth, in a kind of agony.

"Make him in love with you!" said Estelle as she might have said, "Give me wings to fly away and be at rest." "You are so much better a match than I am in every way. Why did he not fall in love with you from the first? It would be so easy to make him, now!"

Lady Elizabeth did not speak for a few seconds.

"Do you think hearts are like shuttlecocks, dear?" she asked, gently. "If Mr. Harford loves you, what can he see in me? and how could I, even for you, play such a mean part as to try to make a man in love with me when he is not so of his own free-will? Besides, I could not if I did try."

"Then tell him how much I hate him," cried Estelle.

"And how can I do even that, dear?" her friend again remonstrated. "He has not yet said that he loves you. How can I, with any regard to your dignity, tell him this?"

"Yes, you can!" said Estelle, almost fiercely. "And if you loved me, Liese, you would."

"I do love you, darling—you know I do; but I could not say this to Mr. Harford. It is the kind of thing that only the person's own self can say."

"And I will!" said Estelle, still in that same fierce and unnatural way by which she was, as it were, transformed from her real self and made into another creature.

"If I am made to marry him I will kill myself," she then said, after a pause. "I feel as sure as of my own existence that he intends to ask me when we are at his horrible place, and that mother means to force me to accept him. That is why we are going. I feel it. I know it. And I will not. I should be wicked and false to myself if I did. I should always feel my poor dear dead darling's wife. I should never feel really and rightly married to this hateful man. And how can I marry, feeling as I do? It would be a crime. Do feelings count for nothing? Why, they are everything. Tell me, Liese, how could I?"

Lady Elizabeth did not answer. What could she say? It was not for her to dissuade another woman—and the woman he loved—from making the happiness of a man as dear to her as Anthony Harford, nor was it for her, as a woman, to persuade a sister to foreswear herself, and give her body without her heart, herself without her love. She was, as it were, caught between two fires, and she had to suffer from the scorching of each. And just for one moment she thought that her own place was almost as hard as Estelle's and that there are other deaths besides that of the body, as we know it.

At this moment the door-bell rang, and Mr. Harford was brought up into Lady Elizabeth's sanctuary, where the two girls were. Lady Kingshouse was never visible before luncheon. My lord was in bed, after a protracted "sweep" last night, and only Lady Elizabeth was available, as Anthony knew. He had been sent on here by Mrs. Clanricarde. He had called at Les Saules, and she, glad of his escort and protection from herself for Estelle, told him where she was to be found, and suggested his going to find her and bring her home, which suggestion he had adopted gladly enough. When he entered the room something came over her friend's face which startled Estelle, preoccupied as she was with her own troubles. Pale as Lady Elizabeth was before, she became paler still, and her calm dignity of manner had a certain strained and almost unnatural stillness, as if she were forcing herself to be unexpressive. But though Estelle saw, she did not understand. It was only afterward, when still further enlightened by her own sufferings, that she remembered what she had seen, and read the underneath of the cards.

Very soon after Anthony came in Estelle rose to go. Anthony, who had not even sat down, made a step forward as if to go too.

"Are you going?" he asked, in his quiet, masterful way.

"Yes," said Estelle, hurriedly.

"Good bye, Lady Elizabeth," said Anthony.

"You need not come, Mr. Harford," exclaimed Estelle.

"Yes. I have got to take you home," he answered.

"I do not want you," said Estelle, turning from him abruptly, and speaking as abruptly as had been her action.

"That is not the question," he laughed a little grimly. "Your mamma" he pronounced it 'marmar' "told me I was to take you back. So here I am."

"I would rather you did not," said Estelle, her color rising, and her black eyes growing gloomy beneath her lowered brow.

"I have got to," was the reply, made without the smallest show of feeling, certainly none of yielding.

"I think it very unkind of you, Mr. Harford, very ungentlemanlike, to do what I don't wish," she cried.

Anthony's bronze cheeks grew livid.

"I am sorry if you are displeased," he said, "but I have your mamma's orders, and I must obey them. I have got to take you home."

"Then I shall not go at all. I shall stay here," said Estelle.

"As you like," answered Anthony seating himself.

Estelle burst into tears.

"I am sorry to be so distasteful an escort," said Anthony; but if he was sorry, his sorrow was very like sternness. "You have got to submit, however, and you have to let me walk with you home."

"I wish I was dead" said Estelle, passionately.

"It's but a little matter to raise Cain or," said Anthony, dryly.

All this time Lady Elizabeth had not spoken. She had not been appealed to by either, and she would have been hard put to it if she had. She, too, felt that Estelle in her present mood was best accompanied, and that even Anthony's ungracious persistence had its valuable side.

"I would go with you, dear," she said, in a low voice, "but I have promised my father to ride with him after luncheon, and it is close on luncheon time now."

"Come, Miss Clanricarde. It is time we were going," said Anthony, who had overheard her. "I promised to take you back for lunch."

There was nothing for it but to obey. She was caught and caged here too, as in other things and at other times. The next day they all left Les Saules; and when the evening came they were seated at Anthony's own table at Thrift by Thorbergh—where Mrs. Latimer and Mary Crosby lived.

CHAPTER V.

THE SETTING IN OF THE NIGHT.

Things financial had grown worse and ever worse at Estelle's home, and had now come to their climax. This failure and that had still further contracted the meagre capital left undissolved by the acids of former failures, and now Mr. Clanricarde would be declared bankrupt unless help should come like a shower of gold from the skies. Saving this miracle it would come to him only through Estelle's marriage. On the wedding day Mr. Harford promised to hand over to his father in-law such and such sums as should release him from his troubles, and set him square before the world and with his creditors. Then, without fail—but not an hour before.

"Would a daughter allow this terrible ruin to fall on the honored heads of her beloved and loving parents, that she might indulge her very proper and natural grief unchecked? Would not such indulgence be selfish, sacred as her grief might be?"

Mrs. Clanricarde was careful of her adjectives, and especially solicitous to speak of Estelle's sorrow with becoming respect.

The mother touched the daughter's heart by her reasoning, her sympathy, her manner. She made her weep as she had not wept since Charlie's death, when she herself, that mother, honestly moved—for, indeed, the peril was great!—earnestly, almost humbly, besought her child for this sacrifice of self to save her and the father. That father, too, at last dismayed, and as destitute of hope as of assets, added his prayers to his wife's, and Estelle was at once softened into pity and trained into the strength of sacrifice. She would then immolate herself for the gain. Out of the ashes of her own happiness should rise their safety; and Charlie in heaven would see and understand, and therefore he would not only forgive, but would bless this seeming perfidy. He would know why, and he would read her heart. He would know that never for one instant had her thoughts, her love, her faithfulness, strayed from him; and that this gift of her poor person was but the bestowal of the husk, the shell, the mask, while all the time the life and the core were in his grave forever.

So she thought, her beautiful brown eyes raised to the cloud-flecked sky, as if trying to see her lover's glorified form somewhere like a cloud itself against the blue; and then, with the passionate sense of sacrifice for duty's sake, she turned to her father and mother, and in a low, soft, solemn voice, said, "Yes, let it be so!"

"And God will bless you now and forever!" said Mrs. Clanricarde, taking her in her arms and weeping genuine tears of both sympathy and relief. But the father, who had always been the most sympathetic of the two, was now the least. With a hurried kiss, that somehow hurt Estelle more than if it had been a sharp word, he slipped from the room and went to Anthony, waiting in the library. The strong man had been forced to fight under cover. That fair fortress would not yield to him. He knew that well enough. But she had to submit to his grave caress, in which was a tumult of passion she neither saw nor dreamed of. She was his victim and his captive, truly; but he would make her his willing slave while he treated her as his sceptred queen. All the tenderness that man can show to woman he poured out on her now, as he ever would, and in time—in time so short as to be a mere nothing—he would win her to himself for ever and ever. No knight of olden time was ever more loyally devoted than was Anthony Harford to this beautiful Elle woman, whose body was empty of its heart and soul. No lover of old romance was ever more tender, more assiduous. He seemed but to live in her eyes—but to live for her happiness.

The news spread like wildfire over dry grass when it reached the loose-hung tongues of Kingshouse. Everybody fell foul of Mrs. Clanricarde as a "managing mother," a "matchmaker," and all the rest of it. They fell foul of her not knowing how much cause lay behind, only Lady Elizabeth and Caleb Stagg being able to measure the amount of coercion and pressure that must have been put on the poor girl to have brought her to this pass.

Meanwhile Mr. and Mrs. Clanricarde, with Anthony and Estelle, called to see Mrs. Latimer. This was only what was due to the widow of a cousin who had left a tidy little income to his unlucky relation—for all the fact of the mesalliance which Mrs. Clanricarde's pride could never forgive. They called so far in vain. They could not see her, for she was ill in bed with bronchitis, said the tall, well-got-up servant, whom Estelle at all events at once recognized as Mary Crosby, Charlie's old nurse, when they were boy and girl together. She went up to her and laid her hand on her arm.

"Mary!" she said. "Mary Crosby!"

"Yes, miss; and you are Miss Clanricarde," returned Mary, her color coming back into her face.

"I knew you all directly you came in, but I did not know that you would remember me," she added, more naturally.

"I thought I knew your face," said Mrs. Clanricarde. "Then you still live with Mrs Latimer?"

"Yes, ma'am," said Mary.

"And she is ill to day?"

"Yes, ma'am. She has the bronchitis She often has," replied Mrs. Latimer's faithful attendant.

"Can we not see her?" asked Mrs. Clanricarde.

"I doubt not, ma'am," said Mary.

"Is she in bed"

"Yes, in bed upstairs."

"Have you a doctor?" then put in George.

"I have not sent for him yet, but I shall if Mrs. Latimer gets worse," said Mary. "You see she has the bronchitis so often that I know what to do—with poultices and Dover's powders. The doctor he taught me, so we do not have him for every little bout."

"I should have liked to have seen her," said George.

"Perhaps she will be better in a day or two," added Mrs. Clanricarde.

"Perhaps so, ma'am," said Mary.

"If she wants anything for her comfort—" said Anthony, leaving the rest to the imagination.

Mary made a courtesy.

"Thank you, sir," she answered; "but Mrs. Latimer is a very old lady and gives no trouble to no one."

"Yes, she is a model tenant," returned Anthony, with a smile.

"Excuse the liberty, ma'am, but I was that grieved to see the death of poor Master Charlie Osborne in the paper." Here genuine tears came into her eyes. "I had lost sight of him, but I never forgot him."

Estelle's face told her all she wanted to know. If her face had not told her, the spasmodic grasp of her arm would have been revelation enough. The poor child turned away her face from them all, and her thought shaped itself into the one wild prayer that went up like a stifled sob, "O God, let me die!"

"Yes, poor fellow, it was an awful death, so sudden and unexpected," said Mrs. Clanricarde; while Anthony's brow grew as black as night, and his dark eyes flashed ominously with sullen fire.

"Come," he said haughtily to his party; "we must be going. We evidently shall not see Mrs. Latimer to-day, and time is passing. Good-morning, woman," to Mary. "Come, Estelle, let me take you."

"Good-bye, dear Mary," said Estelle; and in the face of them all—in defiance of Anthony and of the usual formalities of society—she bent forward and kissed the lips of her dead lover's old nurse, whose eyes had filled with tears when she spoke of his death.

"How unlucky!" said Mrs. Clanricarde to herself, feeling like a second Sisyphus.

Meanwhile Mary felt as one to whom a new vista in a dangerous path has opened itself. She did not see her way, but she knew there was a way which she should some day see, and it was one which would help her. Estelle Clanricarde was engaged to Mr. Harford, but she had been in love with Master Charlie, and she loved him yet. What could she weave out of that? Who knows? Something was sure to come, "else," as she said to Mrs. Latimer, to whom she told all that had passed, "never call me Mary again."

CHAPTER XVI.

FRIENDS IN AFFLICTION.

All things come in their turn, and the dreaded days are as certain as the desired. Slowly, slowly, but oh, how surely, the day of her doom stole on, coming ever nearer till at last it was there, and poor Estelle had to undergo the pain of her sacrifice with as much courage as she could command. The wedding day came and passed unhindered.

The marriage was entirely private. Lady Elizabeth was away, and could not break her visit to come back for even Estelle and that bridesmaidship which was pressed upon her, and this being so, Anthony dispensed with the services of a "best man." They went just as they were, the four immediately concerned; and there was not a vestige of either wedding finery or wedding festivity about the whole affair. They had luncheon before they went, and they all drove together in the Kingshouse Arms close carriage. Estelle wore her travelling dress, which was something as near black as she could get—a blue as dark as that which "Bokhara's maids" wear in memory of their loved and lost; and Mrs. Clanricarde was in her ordinary attire. Even the trousseau had not been got, for the day had been hurried on as much as had been possible; and minor details were yet to be filled in. What was wanted by the three who had the matter more immediately at heart was speed in completion. The rest was valueless.

The whole thing passed without a hitch of any kind; but one little incident seemed to savor somewhat of mystery. Just before luncheon the post-bag came in. Estelle had long given up her private inspection. There was no use in looking for letters from the grave! To-day, however, her mother, searching the contents, for a brief instant held one in her hand and looked at her daughter. Her look and attitude meant plainly, "Estelle, here is a letter for you." With another glance at the envelope she laid it down among her own, and drew a sudden breath as if a danger had passed. Estelle, a little sullenly knitting, as if uninterested in the day and its event, did not see the look nor catch the half-proffered action of the hand. Neither, did she see the look that passed between her father and mother as Mrs. Clanricarde rather hastily unfolded the Times and scanned the "dead and alive" with a certain feverishness of hurry. Neither, again, did she notice how her mother took the supplement away out of the room, nor did it in any way affect her with a sense of strangeness or of mystery that when Anthony came in, he and that mother had one rapid whispered word together. If she had heard it, her life would have been different. That word was from him. "That fellow is alive!" from her "She does not know it, and never must."

After the marriage but little was heard of the bride and bridegroom. Anthony was never an expansive correspondent, and Estelle wrote only once to her mother—a mere address-card in essential meaning, saying they were at Paris, at such and such a hotel, and that the weather was cold and windy. After this no more letters came, and Mrs. Clanricarde was not anxious to hear. Meanwhile she read Charlie Osborne's letter, which then she burned, saying to herself she hoped these two would never meet, and—rather weakly for Mrs Clanricarde, a woman who knew life and could calculate probabilities—she hoped Estelle would never hear that he was alive.

Poor Caleb suffered much, for indeed, the joy of love comes from loving, not from being beloved; and where love is large and selfishness small, there we have the power of such abstraction as Caleb knew, with whom thought made happiness, and to love across space was as pure a delight as to have loved in time and presence would have been.

But if Caleb saw but little of some of those who, for a brief hour in the day, had "taken him up," and nothing at all of others, he and Lady Elizabeth drew closer and closer together. It was a queer choice that she had made of a companion, said the neighborhood, disdainfully. And was she going to take the young man for good and all? Their sniffs and disdains had but little weight with either Lady Elizabeth or Caleb—who, by-the-way, did not know of them.

One day these oddly assorted people were walking in the lane which led to Les Saules and the sacred wood of poor Estelle's now unlawful shrine. Lady Elizabeth was on horseback, and Caleb, with his butterfly net and specimen box, was walking by her horse.

"I hope she is happy, Lady Elizabeth," said Caleb, suddenly. "I doubt it; but I hope it."

"Mr. Harford will do his best," returned the lady.

"Ay, but it is difficult when the love has all gone another way," said Caleb. "And it had all gone with her. I doubt if ever she can call it back."

"Poor Estelle!" sighed his companion. Mingled with her pity was a curious kind of wonder how she could be unhappy with Anthony Harford to love her, to care for her, to live with, and never more be parted from. And he so far superior to poor dear Charlie Osborne in every way! It was strange. It was too strange for Lady Elizabeth to be able to reconcile to her ideas of right assignment in any way.

"It was a queer thing, that announcement of Mr. Osborne's death," then said Caleb. "I have often wondered who was to blame for it. Could it have been Mrs. Clanricarde, think you, Lady Elizabeth?"

"I scarcely like to believe it," she answered.

"It looks like it," he repeated.

"I think she wished the marriage very much," then said Lady Elizabeth. "Their affairs were in a deplorable state."

"Ay," said Caleb, simply. "She would have given that beautiful queen to the least and lowest for a fine ransom. But I doubt if any money will make up to her for what she wanted and had lost."

"Still, Mr. Harford will be good to her," said the lady. "If any one can make her happy, he will."

"Could any one but the one she fancied!" said Caleb.

Enlightened by his own heart he read hers with more accuracy than his generalized knowledge of the world would have given him.

"I suppose not," said Lady Elizabeth. "I wish I could believe otherwise!"

At this moment, walking moodily along the lane, coming from the wood where he had been visiting the old places of meeting—graves now of dead joys—they came face to face with Charlie Osborne, looking in his own person more like a ghost than a living man. He had rested on her love and faith as a man might rest on a rock; and, lo! she had failed him. And by her failure the whole world had, as it were, slipped from him. Had he not been a man, he would have railed like a woman and sobbed like a child. As it was, his large, dark, hollow eyes were suspiciously bright as he met his former rival and Estelle's chief friend, and had not the lane been so narrow that escape was impossible, he would have turned aside rather than have endured the ordeal before him.

"You here!" cried Lady Elizabeth, with more than ordinary kindness of tone and bearing. "When did you come?"

"Last evening," said Charlie.

"Why did you not come to see us?" she asked again. "You know my habits. I am always at home in the morning, and I should have been so glad to see you!"

"I have come only for a few hours," said Charlie, a little sullenly. "I thought I should like to see the old place once more, perhaps for the last time. I did not care to inflict myself on my friends."

"Charlie! inflict!" she remonstrated.

"Well, perhaps the word is ungracious—at least to you, dear Lady Elizabeth," he answered, with a little tremulousness.

"To all who know you, Mr. Osborne," put in poor faithful Caleb, though Charlie had not taken the trouble yet to acknowledge him, even by a look. But he bore the impertinence meekly, and put in his gentle word for Estelle's dear sake. The man she loved must be in a way precious to him, and in honoring Charlie Osborne beyond his deserts he felt that he honored her.

"Thank you," said Charlie, recognizing the meaning of this rather clumsily put compliment. "Are you all well at Redhill, Mr. Stagg?"

"Yes, thank you, Mr. Osborne," was the answer. "Father enjoys good health at all times, but mother gets weakly fits at times."

"And yourself?" he asked.

"Oh, I am alway swell. I never ail anything," replied Caleb. He had become more and more provincial.

"When will you come to the Dower House?" asked Lady Elizabeth.

PECULIAR METHODS.

The aphorism that "all is fair in war, seems to be the guiding star of those whose aim it is to attract the reader's attention in the latter-day newspapers.

Formerly, the casual mention of the merits of an article was all that was necessary to attract attention, but when the advertising columns of the papers became crowded, the reader of the newspaper soon realized that too much time would be consumed in reading all of them, and, as a result, those columns were oftentimes skipped altogether.

It was then that advertising developed into a science—for the preparation of advertising matter which will attract public attention is a task which, nowadays, requires a degree of tact and skill which not every one possesses. The modern advertiser, aware of the public disposition to hurriedly pass over the ordinary advertisements, has called to his assistance all conceivable ingenious devices of the printer's art which will tend to render his advertisement attractive to the reader.

Peculiar methods are often employed—as is usual in the case of the extensive advertising which is done in behalf of Warner's Safe Cure, the noted discovery for all diseases of the kidneys and disorders arising therefrom.

What appears to the reader as current news is discovered upon perusal to be an interesting article which impresses the fact that kidney disease is the original cause of most lung, brain, heart and nervous disorders, and that those disorders are not disease itself, but only symptoms of a disease which can be successfully treated by the use of Warner's Safe Cure, which will remove the primary cause and thereby restore other affected organs to a vigorous and healthy state.

In this instance, the advertiser succeeds in attracting the reader's attention and not only is the name of the advertised article impressed upon the mind, but also the purposes for which its use is adapted.

Perspires on One Side Only.

When William Shockey, a Waverly, O., laborer, aged about 26, is working or exercising, the right half of his body perspires so freely that his clothing becomes as completely saturated as if water had been poured upon him, while the left side remains perfectly dry. The line of demarkation is as exactly drawn as if he had been surveyed by an expert. The line comes across the scalp, forehead and nose, extending down the breast and abdomen, dividing him exactly in halves. One side of the forehead, one side of the nose, and the whole right half sweats most freely, while the other half remains in feverish dryness, never even becoming moist. He attributes the phenomenon to illness from which he suffered some time ago.

Mr. Spurgeon's church in London received 218 additions during the past year by baptism, 28 by profession and 61 by transfers. The membership is 5,275. The church has 26 mission stations, with 4,110 sittings, and also 23 Sunday and ragged schools, with 594 teachers and 7,811 scholars.

A Bed for All.

Ten weary, footsore travellers,
[illegible]
[illegible]
One dark and stormy night.

Nine rooms, no more, the landlord said,
[illegible]
To each of eight a single bed
But the ninth must serve for two.

A din arose. The troubled host
Could only scratch his head
For of those tired men no two
Would occupy one bed.

The puzzled host was soon at ease,
He was a clever man—
And so to please his guest devised
[illegible]

A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H	I

In room marked A two men were placed,
The third was lodged in B,
The fourth to C was then assigned,
The fifth retired to D.

In E the sixth he tucked away,
In F the seventh man,
The eighth and ninth in G and H
And then to A he ran.

Wherein the host, as I have said,
Had laid two travellers by;
Then taking one—the tenth and last—
He lodged him safe in I.

Nine single rooms—a room for each—
Were made to serve for ten;
And this it is that puzzles me
And many wiser men.

Love is Best.

All in a garden fair I sate, and spied
The tulips dancing, dancing side by side,
With scarlet turbans dressed;
All in a garden green at night I heard
The glad, sweet voice of night's melodious bird
Singing that "Love is best."

The shy white jasmine drew aside her veil,
Breathing faint fragrance on the loitering gale
And nodded, nodded "Yes."
Sweetest of all sweet things is love!" and wise
Dance tulips! Pipe, fond bird, thy melodies
Rose petals scattering!"

Yet, sighed the swaying cypress, "who can tell
If love be wise as sweet? If it be well
For love to dance and sing?
I see—growing here always—year by year
The bulbuls die and on their grassy bier
Rose petals scattering."

All in that garden green the rose replied:
"And, cypress, look! I put my leaves aside
Mark what is hid this bush.
Three blue eggs in a close-woven nest,
Sheltered, for music's sake, by branch and breast
There will be bulbuls' bush."

All in that garden green the [illegible] trilled
"Oh, foolish cypress! thinking love was killed
Because he seemed to cease,
My rest is [illegible] hath secrets at her heart,
Good seeds of summer time new buds [illegible] start
There will be roses' peace."

Then lightlier danced the tulips than before
To waftings of the perfumed breeze—and more
[illegible] sang the night [illegible]
The fireflies in the paths fresh lanterns lit,
Her zone of grace the blushing rose [illegible]
And blossomed, pure and pale!

What Is Life?

[illegible]

[illegible]

And [illegible] 'tis not the grosser part—
A fraction of the whole,
The life which satisfies the heart
Is centred in the soul
There lie the sanctities that chase
Away dark error's mist
That fit us with an inward grace
And fit us to exist.

Deep in the soul love rears his throne,
There truth and faith abide
And where they rule, ill is unknown,
And life is glorified.
The outer world though fair to see,
Is full of hate and strife;
And oh! how wretched must he be
Who has no inner life!

Overcome by Another's Suffering.

"It grieves me to give you pain, Mr. Ferguson, but I fear it can never be. Try, try to forget me."

"I'll try, Miss Laura," replied the young man, in a melancholy, hopeless way. "Absorbed in the vortex of business, as I shall be henceforth, I may still the clamor of my aching heart and banish your sweet image from my mind."

"Then you contemplate going into business?"

"I have made arrangements," he said in a hollow voice, "to open a large retail confectionery store."

"Oh, George!" exclaimed the beautiful girl wildly as she flung herself into his arms, "the sight of your sufferings is more than I can bear. I am yours."

T. Granger Stewart, M.D., F.R.S.E., Ordinary Physician to H. M. the Queen in Scotland, Professor of Practice of Physic in the University of Edinburgh, writes: "Hypertrophy of the heart is almost always present in cases of advanced cirrhotic disease, and also in the advanced stages of the inflammatory affection. One may trace in patients the gradual development of this hypertrophy advancing pari passu (together) with the progress of the renal (kidney) affection." In a large number of these cases the kidney disease is entirely overlooked and the trouble ascribed to heart disease as a cause, when in reality the kidney disease is the cause and the heart trouble the effect. This error is made easy on account of the kidney disease having no local manifestations in the majority of cases. The kidney disease can be cured by the timely use of Warner's Safe Cure and the consequences avoided.

A ROOSTER ON A CHURCH.

Why the Chanticleer Perches High Upon the Spire of St. Mark's.

All over the country people of a religious turn of mind have evinced great interest in the outcome of the controversy going on in St. Mark's Episcopal Church in Brooklyn as to the propriety of placing a gilded rooster upon the spire of the church. It now seems, from what has been said by church people possessing a greater knowledge of the significance of religious symbols than the pious gentleman of Brooklyn, that the latter would not have been so sincere in his denunciation of the gilded rooster had he known more about its history in connection with the church. High up on the spire of St Mark's P. E. Church, on Locust street, above Sixteenth, seeming to soar among the clouds, is a gilded rooster, and that it is more than an ornament is attested to by what the rector has said about it. The church is built in that severe Gothic style for which most of the old Episcopal churches in England were noted, and is possessed of no ornamentation or decoration that is not of religious significance. It was built from the preserved plans of an old church in England which has long since succumbed to the wear and tear of time and the elements and the march of improvement. On this old church there was an allegorical crowing rooster, and it was regarded as being typical of the cock which signalized the denial of Christ by Peter. The cock which to-day surmounts the tall spire of St. Mark's Church in this city is but perpetuating the idea, and to all persons by whom its full significance is understood it is regarded as a proper symbol, in that it serves the purpose for which it was originally created, and also has a peculiar significance in awakening sleeping sinners to a consciousness of their wrongdoing and calling them to repentance. The emblem is to be found on a great many churches in this country, and, although it seemed at one time to be dropping into oblivion, there are signs of a revival in its use.—Philadelphia Record.

LIKE A ROMANCE OF '49.

How They Say They Find Gold in South Africa—A Nugget on Each Horn of a Deer.

Something like the excitement over alleged discoveries of gold in Lower California is attending similar news from the Transvaal, in South Africa. The diggings there are reported to be enormously rich, and a swarm of prospectors is flocking to the field. As revealing a hitherto unsuspected vein of imagination and lightsome humor on the part of the Boers, the current story of the discovery of the gold field is interesting. It was first published in the Transvaal Advertiser. A well known resident of the republic, it is said, while out hunting one morning, saw a koodoo bull, which he tried to stalk. After he had slightly wounded the animal, and while he was riding after it down a stony declivity, his horse stumbled, he was thrown, and his rifle was broken. At this the koodoo turned and attacked the man, knocking him down and attempting to kneel on him. By holding the animal's forelegs the man kept the buck upright, but the animal's horns had evidently entered the bank for some distance and its head was held down close upon the man's breast. The animal seemed as anxious as the man to get the horns loose but was evidently helpless, the horns being held fast in the ground. Held thus, unable to move, man and beast remained in the broiling sun all that day. At nightfall jackals and wolves came growling about, and even brushed against the man and sprang upon the buck. But the yells of the man and the kicks of the buck kept them at bay until dawn, when they slunk away. Soon after daylight a rifle shot was heard, and a bullet slightly wounded the man in the forehead. By waving his handkerchief and shouting he prevented further firing, and the hunter, who had at first seen only the buck, came up and learned the real situation. Wishing to take the animal alive, he hurried off to the nearest farm, and brought back men with ropes and shovels, who bound the buck and extricated the man. But when the horns were at last freed there was found upon each a mass of metal, which, being removed, proved to be nuggets of gold, weighing respectively 8 and 6½ pounds. This led to the discovery of a rich gold field. Any one doubting the entire accuracy of this story can make further inquiries at the office of the Transvaal Advertiser.

Advice Always Seasonable.

John G. Whittier's advice to young men: Identify yourself in your youth with some righteous unpopular cause. There is a world of wisdom in that. Young men in and out of college, there is the way open to usefulness and historic renown. No cause was ever more unpopular or more unlikely to succeed than that of abolition in the thirties and forties. Some young men of talent and pluck identified themselves with it. They were laughed at, threatened, called vile names, attacked right and left. They defended themselves, met the world in battle, and grew strong in the conflict, and triumphed when their cause triumphed. Among those young men were William Lloyd Garrison, Wendell Phillips, Henry Ward Beecher and John G. Whittier. The triumph of a righteous cause is a subject for history, and the names of those men who helped it to triumph must be treated by the historian.

The Jesuit Oath.

La Minerve publishes the following, which it claims to be the only vow taken by the Jesuits: "Almighty and everlasting God, I, —— although in every way most unworthy to present myself before You, but confiding nevertheless in Your goodness and infinite mercy and urged by a desire to serve You, vow to Your Divine Majesty, in the presence of the Most Holy Virgin Mary and the whole of Your heavenly court, poverty, chastity and perpetual obedience in the Society of Jesus, and I promise to enter this society to live and die therein, interpreting all things according to the constitutions of said society. I therefore most humbly beseech Your infinite goodness, through the precious blood of Jesus Christ, that You may be pleased to agreeably accept this holocaust, and that, as You have given me the desire and the means to offer it to You, You may furthermore give me abundant grace to accomplish it."

"SELF-RELIANCE" TO THE FRONT.

What He Says on an Important Subject.

Several days ago we published a letter from "Experience," upon a subject which is attracting considerable attention, and we have since received a similar communication from another, which we publish in full:

To the Editor. A short time ago I noticed in your columns a letter signed "Experience." At first I was inclined to regard the letter referred to as a clever advertising scheme of Messrs. H. H. Warner & Co., to attract notice to their well known Warner's Safe Cure, which is, it must be admitted, of the greatest value and merit, but upon more mature consideration I am inclined to believe that the letter is a genuine expression from a well informed individual, who is not afraid to grapple with a question which should receive greater attention.

It is daily becoming more apparent that there is something radically wrong in the manner in which disease is being treated by those whose profession it is to heal the sick. A man is taken ill, and a physician is called in. "Only a slight nervous disorder," remarks the physician. The slight nervous disorder, however, refuses to be controlled, and in a short time the physician ominously remarks that the patient is suffering from consumption. Things go on for a while until the patient is afflicted with what the physician calls "a series of complicated disorders." Treated for first one thing and then another—dosed with all sorts of vile concoctions—the patient finally succumbs, and then for the first time it is learned that the real cause of suffering and death was disease of the kidneys, which manifested itself in various other disorders—all of which could have been promptly cured had a timely use been made of Warner's Safe Cure, which is the most important discovery made in connection with scientific progress in recent years. The reference made by "Experience" to the Robinson poisoning cases, where no less than seven members of one family died within five years from the effects of arsenical poisoning without attracting the attention of skilled physicians, who were in attendance, to the real cause, but who issued death certificates for pneumonia, typhoid fever, bowel disease, etc., is a startling disclosure of the ignorance which prevails among those whose duty it is to definitely detect and treat the true cause of disease.

I quite agree with "Experience" in the opinion that, after all, those who take matters of health in their own hands and place their reliance upon a well known remedy which is time-tested and known to be of benefit are better off than those who trust themselves in experimental and ignorant hands.

SELF RELIANCE.

The Largest Statue in the World.

It has been freely stated that the Bartholdi Statue of Liberty in New York harbor is the largest in the world, but this is not the case. The largest statue is the great Egyptian Sphinx sculptured out of a spur of rock at Gizeh, near the pyramids. Its length is 172 ft. 6 in., its height 56 ft. Again, there is a huge idol at Bengalor which is 111 ft. in height, and therefore overtops M. Bartholdi's statue by six feet, leaving out of consideration its spiked diadem. One hundred and thirty-seven feet six inches is the height assigned to this present made by the great Republic of the old world to that of the new, but this is only obtained by measuring from the feet to the upper end of the torch which the right hand of the statue holds above its head. The Colossus of Rhodes which, while it existed, was the largest statue in the world, and one of its seven wonders, was about 123 feet in height. Its legs spanned the harbor of Rhodes and allowed a ship under full sail to pass beneath them. The Saracens, who captured Rhodes in the year 672, sold the metal of which it was composed to a Jewish merchant for a sum equivalent to £36,000 of our money.

Fashions in Pistols.

Gentleman (in Chicago gun store)—"I want a pistol."

Dealer (politely)—"Yes, sir. Here is a small, plain weapon, usually bought for defence against footpads. Here is a silver-mounted beauty, very popular for shooting sweethearts, and here, sir, is our chef d'oeuvre, full jeweled, rolled-gold plate, all the rage now for shooting wives."—New York Sun.

Latin as She Looks.

Young lady (at book store)—Have you Sir Thomas Browne's "Religio Medici"?

Bookseller—No, ma'am, but we can send and get it for you, if you wish. Young lady—I do. My fiancee is a medical student, and I want to let him see that some doctors have been religious."

Five Years Later.

She—Do you recollect, dear, how just after we were married you stepped off at this station and got me a cup of coffee?

He—Yes, but the time-table's been changed since then, and I've just had time to rush off and get myself a drink.

Pretty Girls Safe.

Anxious dame (hurrying from a train)—Mercy! Clara is so careless. I'm afraid she'll fall.

Husband (following)—No danger. A brakeman is at the platform and no railroad man ever let a pretty girl like Clara get hurt.

An Easy Pronunciation.

"How do you pronounce the word ennui?" asked Mr. De Porque of his wife, spelling the word to her, deliberately.

"Oh, it's quite easy the way I do it."

"Well, how do you pronounce it?"

"Just ennyway."

Kindly Assistance.

Landlord (to tenant)—I shall raise your rent on the 1st of May, Mr. Brown.

Mr. B.—I wish you would. It is pretty hard work for me to raise it myself.

Queen Victoria, during one of her walks at Biarritz, last week, met a nursemaid and a baby. Her Majesty stopped and made some pleasant speech about the baby, whereupon the nursemaid—an English woman—was so overwhelmed with awe and confusion that she turned and fled, leaving the baby with the Queen, who had to send her gentleman-in-waiting in hot pursuit.

STRICKEN WITH APOPLEXY.

An aged gentleman of our acquaintance went out after a hearty meal to remove the ice from the sidewalk. He worked as an old man naturally would with his head and shoulders bent low. He suddenly fell, became unconscious and soon died.

What was the cause of his death?

Apoplexy—the physicians would say apoplexy of the brain.

In persons of good health, the coats of the arteries throughout the whole body are tough and elastic. In unhealthy persons, particularly those whose kidneys are diseased, the walls of the arteries undergo "degeneration"—due to the action of the impurities in the blood which the kidneys have been unable to remove.

In these cases, when the action of the heart is intensified by vigorous exercise or excitement, the pressure upon some artery becomes too strong for it in its weakened state—a rupture occurs and a stroke of apoplexy follows as a matter of course.

Derangements of the kidneys are a common cause of apoplexy.

Whenever they fail in the complete removal of the waste matter in the blood, the deadly poison known as uric acid accumulates, and creeps through all the blood channels where it rapidly causes decay.

The primary cause of all organic disease, such as paralysis, consumption, heart disease and nervous disorders, is directly attributable to a failure of the kidneys in their special function of purifying the blood. Kidney derangement is without doubt the most aggravating as well as the most prevalent of all the ills of the present day, and unless kidney disease is taken in time and a prompt restorative, such as Warner's Safe Cure, applied—death will inevitably result.

Advanced kidney disease has baffled the united efforts of the best physicians for years, and it is solely due to Warner's Safe Cure, a simple vegetable discovery, that modern science has been able to successfully cope with it.

Life insurance companies make sure of its non existence before issuing their policies, and the learned and careful physician will not attempt to prescribe for a patient afflicted with serious illness before first ascertaining if this disease is present.

SWEET SIXTEEN.

The Difference Dress Made in a Young Girl's Feelings.

Minnie was 16, writes a New York correspondent of the Cincinnati Enquirer. She wore girlish frocks reaching down to her ankles only, but to make up for the juvenile shortages of the skirts the bodices came always up to her chin and had sleeves to her wrists. Her hair hung in a braid, and she had the aspect of an immature maiden. Her manners were correspondingly free and innocent. She had a rather audacious cousin, Jack, who took all manner of liberties with her, within the bounds of purity. They were constantly familiar and affectionate toward each other. One day Jack called at the House. On departing, he took Minnie up in his arms, carried her down to the front hallway and kissed her good afternoon. There were several witnesses, and none of us thought anything of the [illegible]. Nor did the [illegible]. She had her arm around Jack's neck while he carried her for fear of falling, and with no show of her liking or disliking the mutual hug. She neither helped nor [illegible] his kiss, but accepted it as [illegible] as though it had been given by [illegible]. Well, that same evening Jack and Minnie went with other members of the family to a ball. Minnie [illegible] first time in her life wore the long skirts of an adult [illegible] her hair was done up in an imposing coiffure, her open corsage gave evidence of womanliness and her fair taper arms were bare to the tops of her dimpled shoulders. I was with her in the parlor when Jack came. He was astonished by the transformation. He had left her a child in the afternoon. He found her a young woman in the evening. Now, mark [illegible] maladroit a man is, and now, by [illegible] a woman lives up to her clothes. It is [illegible] point that I wish to impress on Bro. Howells, of Harper's Magazine, and Bro. Abbott, of the Christian Union. Jack didn't realize that the change of raiment demanded a simultaneous and equally radical change in manners. He grabbed Minnie in his arms, gave her a hug and kissed her. But did she artlessly and coolly submit again? Not much. She drew herself away with dignity. Her face flushed genuinely, and she looked like a Queen sentencing a traitor to the block.

"If you ever do such a thing as that again," she said, "I shall forbid you the house."

"But—but—now—" Jack began to protest; "you needn't be so bumptious, Minnie, just because you have—well—" and his eyes dropped from the fresh disclosure of shoulders to the new concealment of ankles—"just because you have straightened up through your clothes."

"That's just it, Jack," and Minnie sighed with regret at the necessary assumption of decorum, "and if you try to hug me, I'll scream for mamma." Then she naively added: "But I suppose I'll be wearing the old frocks once in a while here at home."

Old World Notes of Real Interest.

The English courts hold that when a man writes asking another to "favor him with a check" for a bill, the intent is that the check is to be sent by post, and the creditor is liable if the check is lost in the mails.

PROMISE OF SCIENCE.

How the Earth is Gradually Being Used Up by Mankind.

Everybody knows that the world is wearing out—that the time is coming when we will have no coal to burn in our grates, and no iron to make our grates out of, even had we the coal. A close record of the output of the oil fields discovers the fact that the petroleum reservoirs are running dry and investors have not the faith in the inexhaustible flow of natural gas that the sellers of wells could wish. We know that precious metals are dug out in less quantities than formerly; that the diamond market, in spite of Kimberly is cornering itself; that mahogany and pine will some day be things of the past, like the buffalo robe and the dodo. We are now confronted with the fact that the guano deposits will not last forever, that there is a human limit to the production of electricity that our children several times removed will have neither quinine, chloroform nor aniline dyes. Of course this general exhaustion of old earth's treasure house is some time ahead of us. It will not happen in our day nor in the next century. We can go on burning the candle at both ends for a few hundred years before humanity has to adjust itself to the newer or more economical conditions. But despite the fact that the time of stress is so far ahead of us that we can look on to it jokingly, it is pleasant to learn that science is getting ready for the rainy day. We are on the eve of a new age and on the threshold of a new civilization. Aluminium, according to Nature is making ready to take the place of steel, and it will be cheaper, lighter, stronger and one thousand fold more plentiful and cheap. Its price now puts the new element in the debatable land between pure chemistry and practical commerce, and it is a question of time merely when we shall build our houses, our telephones and our air ships out of the silvery core of our common clay, instead of heavy and refractory iron. Heat and food, according to science, we are to gather from the sea in proper fish culture and wise electrical work. The economist brightly believes that we will solve the labor problem before the middle of the 20th century and solve it to the satisfaction of both parties.

Budget of the Pope for 1888.

The Pope has lately examined the accounts of his income and expenditure during the year 1888. The ordinary and extraordinary expenses of the Vatican during the year have been as follows: Alms given in Rome £4,000; alms given abroad £4,000; alms given in Italy, £[illegible]; ordinary subsidies in Rome £2,400; ordinary subsidies in Italy £3,000; ordinary subsidies to the Church generally [illegible]; ordinary subsidies to poor priests, [illegible] for the [illegible], £20,000; [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible]

It would be fatal to an ordinary bridge to which the tread of a horse or steady tramp of soldiers is fatal, to say nothing of the more rhythmic pace of the mule.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

A New Photographic Device.

One of the curious things that begin to appear in drawing rooms was shown me last night. It looked like a pretty piece of furniture, something in the way of a small centre-table. But it was not a table. It was the latest perfection in the photographer's art, for it was a peculiarly made camera. It is self-acting and can take twelve pictures without any aid from human intelligence. Standing in the parlor, it will note every figure in front of it, and it will play a leading role before long in breach-of-promise suits unless the knowledge of its silent powers is spread abroad.—New York Star.

Meat! meat! Buy your meat from Petch & Mitchell, Flesherton's well known butchers. Some choice veal now on hand.

LOST.—Mr. Mathewson, mail driver between Flesherton and Epping, lost a rubber coat on Thursday last some place between here and the town line, Artemesia and Euphrasia. The finder would confer a great favor by leaving it at Eugenia P.O. or this office

That hacking cough can be so quickly cured by Shiloh's Cure. We guarantee it For sale at the Medical Hall

New tea sets, toilet sets, dinner sets and three hogsheads of new glassware and crockery just opened at M. Richardson & Co's.

It is said that one gentleman's family, in this vicinity, numbering six persons, got away with thirteen dozen eggs on Easter.

Are you made miserable by indigestion constipation, dizziness, loss of appetite yellow skin? Shiloh's Vitalizer is a positive cure. For Sale at the Medical Hall.

Another consignment of English dress goods direct from Manchester; just opened at M. Richardson & Co's. Splendid values.

Somebody with more wit than wisdom has been displaying said wit at the Boyne bridge, by throwing pieces of the sidewalk over the embankment. It is a pity some one in authority could not catch them at it. It was a mighty poor kind of fun, boys, and should be indulged in very sparingly.

Just received this week—A large consignment of men's and boy's ready made clothing, superior in style and make, at M. Richardson & Co's.

Messrs Petch & Mitchell, are prepared to furnish you with the best meats to be procured. All kinds in their season. Will call for orders.

Canada is a free country, but everybody is forced to believe that W. Clayton sells the best and cheapest boots in Flesherton.

Mr. N. Barber, of Owen Sound, has decided to open an agency in Flesherton for the sale of the Singer sewing machine.

Dr. Thomas Henderson, L.D.S., D.D.S., Toronto, will be in Flesherton on May 1 and 2. Those having unruly teeth should visit him.

M. Richardson & Co. are showing a fine range of wall papers, window shades, etc., and have on hand alabastine, the celebrated hard wall finish in white and tints.

Big changes have taken place in the newspaper world during the past week or so. The Orangeville Advertiser, Hanover Post and Stayner Sun have all changed hands, we hope for the best in each case. The new proprietor of the Hanover paper is a brother of Mr. Mitchell of the Durham Chronicle.

Many children delight to go barefoot in the summer time, but full grown men like to keep their bunion-covered pedal extremities hidden, and always buy boots for that purpose at W. Clayton's.

Dr. Sinclair M.D., M.A., L.C.P.S.O., M.C.P.S.M., The well known Scottish Specialist of Toronto, will be at Munshaw's hotel, Flesherton, on Tuesday, May 7th. Dr. Sinclair is an old visitor here, and will no doubt receive his usual large number of callers on that day.

The service of song in the Methodist Church Sunday evening was very enjoyable. The choir rendered excellent music. Mr. M. Richardson gave a short, interesting address upon the season, followed by a few remarks from Rev. Mr. Shilton. Several of the pieces given by the choir—solos, quartets and anthems—were of more than ordinary excellence. The choir deserves congratulation upon the excellent song service furnished on Sunday evening. The floral decorations were very handsome, and were all furnished by our genial green house proprietor, Mr. Beecroft.

A telegram from Winnipeg says that W.F. Doll's wholesale jewelry store was entered by two burglars on Saturday morning last and were making their way to the vaults where the diamonds are kept, when a boy named Hunt, who sleeps on the premises, heard the noise On his going to the bedroom door one of the burglars sighted him and fired a revolver, the shot taking effect in the boy's arm. The latter returned the fire, but without effect. Burglar No 2 took the revolver from the boy and gave him a severe choking. The police have no clue to the crooks.

Get Married.

Every newly married couple may have The Advance as a wedding present free for six months, upon furnishing satisfactory evidence of the marriage. This is a standing offer and application must be made six months from date of marriage

A Fine Beef.

Messrs. Petch & Mitchell killed a very heavy beef animal on Monday. It was a four year old heifer, raised and fattened by Wm. Flesher, of Orange Valley, and weighed when dressed 740 lbs., or 185 lbs to the quarter. Our beefeaters may now revel in fat steaks for a few days. Mr Flesher seems to thoroughly understand fattening stock.

The Price of Eggs.

The statement in last week's Advance that eggs were 9 cents a dozen was only partially correct. The low price was only paid by one or two of our business men for a day or so. Ten cents is the price paid by all at present, and it will not likely be lower.

Baseball.

Flesherton Baseball Club organized on Saturday evening last, with the following as officers for the ensuing year: S Damude, President; J.W. Armstrong, Vice President; Wm. Clark Captain; J. G. Russell, assistant; G.W. Hawk, Sec.-Treas; C.J. Leitch, H A. Hawk, G. Mitchell, working committee.

Dr. Wright

Another of Flesherton's young men has distinguished himself by becoming a full fledged doctor in the person of Mr. Will Mc. Wright, who took his degree of M.B. at the University examination in Toronto last week. Dr. Wright has been a persevering young man, and it is with very much pleasure that we tender him our congratulations.

Markdale Spring Show.

Markdale spring show was held on Tuesday. A great portion of Flesherton prize winners were again successful there. Mr. Burnett's Derby took first in Clydesdales and Mr. Wright's Derby second. A.S. Vandusen's Billy V. took first in roadsters and J.G.Carson second. We did not receive the complete list.

Arrested.

On Saturday afternoon last a telegram was received here from Walkerton to detain one George Garbut, who was wanted in that town, for what cause was not stated. The telegram was delivered to Mr. John Fields, who acted upon it and collared his man between the village and station. Garbut remained in custody until Tuesday afternoon, when a constable arrived from Walkerton and took him in hand. The warrant charged Garbut with fradulent appropriation of money.

Runaway.

Mr. Noble Lawrence met with a severe and costly accident on Saturday afternoon last while drawing a heavy load of freight from the station. While descending Adams' hill some small boxes became misplaced and fell upon the horses, causing them to run away. The wagon went over the embankment, which is several feet high at that point, and a large amount of freight, most of which belonged to M. Richardson & Co., was more or less damaged. Mr. Lawrence had his wrist dislocated and shoulder injured. The exact amount of damage done to goods is not known.

Personal.

Mr. Jos. Blackburn, Esq., and Mrs. Blackburn spent Easter with the latter's parents in Gorrie.

Mrs. J. Gordon and family left for New York on Tuesday morning.

Mr. Will Dinwoodie left yesterday for Toronto. He may possibly visit Iowa before returning.

Dr. Will Wright returned home on Tuesday evening.

Miss Lizzie Armstrong and Miss J. Bannon visited friends in Owen Sound for the Easter holidays

Dr. George Armstrong of Minneapolis, is spending the summer in California for the benefit of his wife's health.

The Misses Lizzie and Annie Richardson are home from Owen Sound for the holidays. Also Miss Ada Sproule, from Pine Grove.

Special Announcement

We have made arrangements with Dr. B.J. Kendall Co., publishers of "A Treatise of the Horse and his Diseases" which will enable all our subscribers to obtain a copy of the valuable work free by sending their address (enclosing a two-cent stamp for mailing same) to Dr. B.J. Kendall Co., Enosburgh Falls, Vt. This book is now recognized as standard authority upon all diseases of the horse, as its phenomenal sale attests, over four million copies having been sold in the past ten years, a sale never before reached by any publication in the same period of time. We feel confident that our patrons will appreciate the work, and be glad to avail themselves of this opportunity of obtaining a valuable book

It is necessary that you mention this paper in sending for the "Treatise." This offer will remain open for only a short time

Fire at Priceville.

A destructive fire occurred at Priceville early Tuesday morning, by which Mr. A. McCabe, merchant, lost his building and part of his stock, together with household goods, a fine watch and considerable clothing. A vacant store and dwelling next to Mr. McCabe's owned by Mr. Wait, also fell a prey to the devouring element. The fire started the previous evening about 9 o'clock from a defective stovepipe in rear of the store, but was extinguished as was thought. However, it appears to have been smouldering, and burst into flames at an early hour in the morning. Mr. McCabe was well insured, but Mr. Wait had no insurance on his building. Mr. McCabe has taken up temporary quarters in Nicholl's old stand.

Lecture

Rev. Charles E. Perry lectured Tuesday evening in the Town Hall on the Jesuit Bill to an audience of about 35. He came here under the auspices of L.O.L. No. 883. An admission fee of 15 cents was charged. Rev. Mr. Perry might possibly understand how to preach a good sermon, but L.O.L. No. 883 made a big mistake in securing him to deliver a lecture on Jesuitism. He did not appear to be posted in his subject to any extent. We listened to his remarks for three quarters of an hour, and during that time his ostensible subject was not touched upon. He did not attempt a discussion of the Jesuit Bill, and sacrificed argument to rhetorical declamation. At the close of his remarks Dr. Christoe spoke for ten minutes and gave the audience more information in that time about the subject than Mr. Perry had in an hour and a half. Financially the affair was a sad failure, but Mr. Perry was at one time stationed here, and it appears that the people of Flesherton knew what to expect.

Flesherton orchestra rendered a few selections in their usual excellent manner.

E. G. Spring Show.

We had no time or space last week to give an extended report of the spring show held here on Wednesday, 17th, but simply gave the prize list. It was a matter of general remark that the number of entries was not so large as that of last year, but the quality of stock shown was somewhat superior. There was but one judge—Mr. Middleton, of Barrie and he gave almost universal satisfaction. His judging was careful and his decisions just. There were some magnificent animals shown. In the Clydesdale class W.H. Burnett's Lord Durby, which took first, is classed as one of the finest animals ever brought to this township. He is very heavy and well proportioned, weighing at present over 2,000 lbs. Mr. Wright's Lord Durby, 2nd prize, was in extra good trim, and held his head in a manner that spoke quite plainly of the satisfaction he felt at the pleasant (to him) termination of the big arbitration. He looked extremely well. In Canadian draught Mr. Holley's Young Ontario Chief and Mr. Beattie's Lucky Lad are too well known to require comment. In general purpose Mr. A. Johnston's young Nugent and Mr. Moffat's grey were well mated and required close judging to determine their relative merits. In the roadster class there were several entries, Mr. Jas. Henry, of Markdale showing his span of bays, the larger one of which took second place. Mr. Vandusen's Billy V. was the admired of all eyes. He is "as pretty as a picture" and deservedly took first, as he also did at Dundalk on the following day. In the thorough-bred bloods there was only one entry, Mr. Haine's St. James. He is a pretty animal, and his pedigree is traceable back to Arabian stock.

CORRESPONDENCE.

English and Canadian Forestry.

To the Editor of The Advance.

SIR—I trust that the present spring will see a considerable amount of tree planting done. When travelling last summer through England and Scotland, nothing was so plainly observable to a Canadian as the fact that the country was well sheltered. Everywhere were hedges, everywhere fine trees, along them every here and there plantations. Those who owned the land apparently were far from grudging the trees their standing room, and the result well paid them. Such crops of wheat, such weight of grass per acre as was there obtained doubled, or often trebled Canadian products. Comparing Canadian with English farming practice, no one could doubt that the shelter given had much to do with the fertility of the land. It was a painful contrast to many of our Canadian farms where it looks as if the owner had cut every tree from the surface to produce a square expanse of bare earth, as bare, as hard and as unsightly as an Illinois stock yard.

How different this to what a farm should be, with its reserve of forest well kept, free from the intrusion of cattle and in good forest condition—its bed deep with leaves, its young trees rising emulous to the height of the old, ready to replace them when they are cut down for use, its massive wealth of foliage, its pleasant walks cool and umbrageous in the hottest day, its living springs preserved by trees, its lines of wind breaks opposed to the cutting blasts. Such a farm so kept is a place of beauty, a place to live and die in. The other—shaved flat to the surface, is a place to toil, to make money if farming pays perhaps, but it is never a pleasure to those who inhabit it, if they possess any of the finer sentiments of our nature. It is not always even the best place to make money by farming, for he who has the trees will have the grass crops, he who has the grass crops will have the manure and he who has the manure will have the wheat.

The new forestry report is now being distributed, and any one desiring it, by sending his address to me will receive it by mail. It is a pamphlet distributed free yearly by the Ontario government there is no price for the book and no charge for postage. It will be found to contain much information interesting to all who interest themselves in the forest

House on Fire.

I hear I am oise of men and boys,
The fireman rattled too,
The fire! they cried, and then cried I!
Oh, dear, what shall I do? Old Song.

Editor Advance.

The dry, hot weather is at hand when accidental fires are more liable to occur and progressive Flesherton "beautiful for situation," cannot well afford to have its progress impeded by the "fire fiend." If you have no fire engine would it not be advisable to request the "city fathers" to begin immediate preparations to "meet the foe?" The Advance is (and always has been) a true friend to Flesherton and I am of the opinion that a few remarks from you upon this important subject would be heeded by the town officials, and better protection from fire be the result.

N.B. Strange to say, at this moment the Winnipeg fire alarm sounded, and the engine rushed past! The "fiend" is again at work. You are also a friend of Eugenia's "beauteousness," therefore please bring this "all devouring element" matter before the minds of those citizens, that they may early prepare for fires accidental or otherwise. Eugenia has already had a little "hot taste," a full meal may yet be in store if not headed off in time. Next comes Kimberley "in the vale" (or valley) the residents thereof have also had "experience" not of desirable repetition. You have an interest of more than property consideration. Urge the enterprising villagers to protect themselves against another fiery visitation before it is too late. Yes, I am aware that not many millionares reside in either of the aforementioned localities, consequently a first class fire brigade cannot be expected to organize, but there are several kinds of fire extinguishers available for villagers of moderate means, chemicals very effective in subduing fires in incipient stages. One of those small portable hand or garden force pumps ought to be in every house in town and country; a boy or girl can use them. They will quickly put out a roof on fire if not too far advanced. They are used for watering gardens, spraying fruit trees to destroy vermin, washing high windows outside, etc. I've had a brass one upwards of twelve years, price $10, in good condition yet. It will throw a good stream to the top of a two story house. Tin pumps cost about $2.50. Oil frequently to prevent rusting. Now, Mr. Editor, if by publishing the foregoing, only one house or valuable building is saved, you will have your reward.

Hoping your readers will take warning in time, and renewing my promise of further disclosure of "things which have never seen the light" through The Advance, I dispatch this message for the good it may do. WM. PURDY

Winnipeg, April, 1889.

To the Editor of The Advance.

DEAR SIR—Would you kindly allow me space in your valuable columns to make an explanation in regard to this Kimberley Glee Club bill. There are generally two sides to a story, and when both are heard there is a chance to decide which is right. In his article of last week the Eugenia writer has made some very gross errors and many glaring misrepresentations. In the first place he says "the Eugenia choir, owing to unavoidable circumstances, was not in a position to get up the music," making it appear as though Eugenia had a choir at that time. Now, this does not concern us, but we claim that a person who makes such slight misrepresentations is capable of enlarging them. Again he says, "one of the committee, appointed to look after the music, asked a member of the club on what terms they would furnish music, and he the member replied that he could not tell until he saw some of the club." Here his memory either rambles or else he has been misinformed. This person whom he mentions proves to be the organist, and nothing was mentioned to her about terms. When the club received the invitation they accepted it under the agreement that 1st. They were to receive free tickets. 2nd. They were to be conveyed to Eugenia and back; and they were also told that the organist would expect pay. The former clause of the agreement was very politely carried out. The second owing to the generosity of the club was ruled out, and they provided their own means of conveyance. But the third clause is the one which stuck in their digestive organs. The Kimberley correspondent feeling somewhat concerned in behalf of the organist, concluded that he would gently remind them of their gentlemanly duty through the columns of your paper—a scheme which has worked very satisfactorily, insomuch that the organist has received her dues for her pains in practicing and training the club for the occasion. The reason why a bill was not sent in is very easily explained, in fact there is no explanation at all. It was days as gentlemen to ascertain what was required, and as to "forgiving the wrong" (as they term it) "on account of the tenderness of the Glee Club's secretary and spokesman," most likely the writer sports a cane and a green eye-glass, I cannot know

ONE CONCERNED.

School Matters.

To the Editor of The Advance.

The letter of Tyrone in your issue of 18 inst. is before us. As the writer has made a sneering fling at Flesherton Station, and his statements not agreeing with our opinion and knowledge of facts, we beg to offer reply to parts of his letter. We cannot blame the angularities of the township for school difficulties so much as we blame the formation of the council of the township. Let the whole affairs of the township be administered without fear or favor, and school sections and everything else can then be equalized justly and for the proper, rightful benefit of all concerned. The Flesherton Station school is a success and rejoices the hearts of the people interested in it. All the difficulties and extra expense that have been suffered were caused by the obduracy of the Township Council, and their action was at once reversed by the intelligent and disinterested board of arbitrators appointed by the County Council. the school was formed from fully well consideration of all the circumstances, and has had from its first inception the full statuary school population, and although the territory is small, that is not the fault of the present ratepayers, they are quite willing to welcome in all surrounding territory which should properly belong to this section. Tyrone's attempt to reason people into keeping quiet on school matters is quite good for people centrally situated in school sections, and are helped to keep up schools convenient for themselves at the expense of others too far off to attend. But take the original standpoint and view for what the public schools were originated, was it not that all the children of Canada should have put within their reach the means of obtaining a good common education, and not to keep up extra good schools in centres of large circuits at which a great part of the children could not attend? Let the school sections of this township be at once equalised so as to benefit the whole population of Artemesia, and let people desiring better things pay out of their own pockets for them.

Yours truly
FLESHERTON STATION

To The Editor of The Advance.

Notwithstanding the fact that the so-called editor of the Markdale Standard is notorious for his vagaries and inconsistencies, yet he attempts a little criticism upon our report of the last concert given here by the worthy members of the I.O.G.T. He says we attempted to shut the I.O.G.T. by declaring the whole thing a beastly farce, which, upon its face, is misleading, as he in no place says that we were simply reporting the concert. What we may have said in a hasty report alluded to the concert solely and not to the order, as we are as fully in accord and sympathy with it and the principles which it inculcates as the sanctimonious editor of the Standard. In our youthful "zeal and inexperience we may be inconsistent, but we are honest and admit it, and suggest that the Standard man, if he aspires to become a critic, stick to the truth pure and simple.

LETTERS FROM THE FARM.

Specially Written for The Advance.

MR. EDITOR—A considerable period of time has vanished into the "ago" since you published my last letter—five weeks. I have been very busy since then. I have chucked five years of hilarious fun into that four weeks. I think I promised you that I would send you one of sister Martha's I dassen't call her "Mat" in the newspaper any more loveletters for publication. It grieves me that circumstances do not warrant me in undertaking so great a risk. Martha has dad enlisted on her side and those two and the bridle strap make discretion the better part of valor. I don't give grass for either of them, but the strap is an argument that floors me.

The other evening when my beautiful freckle-faced sister Martha had company in the parlor and the only light there was that shed by the company's fire-bug (i. e. his hair) I had things fixed for a little jubilee. I raised the parlor window high enough to insert a pea-gun. The pea-gun is a little tin tube for blowing peas through. After the company arrived and had got fairly seated with its arms around Martha's 18x36 waist I slid cautiously around the house, planted a pea in the gun and pointed it for Redney's ear. It struck him square on top of the nose. There is a mark on the ceiling to-day where his head barned the plaster when it struck. Jump! Well, if that fellow didn't jump a flea never jumped. He didn't know where it came from, nor what it was, either. When his fiery disposition had cooled down, thanks to Martha's sympathetic attention, they commenced talking about the strange experience and decided that it arose from some unaccountable contraction of the muscles centering in his nose (possibly a momentary paralysis. They were just about right. I paralyzed his nose. Well, as I was saying, things cooled down and I prepared another pea, and was just going to shoot his whiskers when an earthquake lit on my rudder and father's hand gently grasped me in its embrace. Reader, if you are a father I needn't describe how this trick is done; and if you are a long-suffering, innocent young man like me, you will fully appreciate the delicacy of my situation. Father didn't say much. He is a man of few words and makes the halter strap talk for him. Its persuasive powers are more fully developed than his. What puzzles me now is to know whether I had enough fun out of it to counterbalance the agony.

Yours doubtingly

DOMINION PARLIAMENT.

Sir John Macdonald, in reply to inquiries put by Mr. Mulock, said the attention of the Government had not been drawn to an article in the Scientific American, pointing out structural defects in the St. George bridge whereby the recent disaster might be accounted for, and had received no report on the subject, but would now give it some attention.

Sir John Macdonald, in answer to the inquiry of Mr. Shanly, said the Government received a petition on the 12th of March instant from the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company protesting against the granting of subsidies to railways already duplicated and competing with existing lines. No action, of course, could be taken on this petition, but it would be considered when any railway schemes are laid before Parliament.

Mr. Charlton inquired whether it was the intention of the Government during the present session to introduce a Bill to incorporate the Orange Order.

Sir John Macdonald—It is not the intention of the Government to introduce such a Bill, and it would therefore be a private Bill, and so I am afraid my hon. friend will be deprived of the opportunity of voting against the Bill, as he did twice before. (Laughter.)

Mr. Charlton As the right hon. gentleman has gone a little outside of the question proper, I may be permitted to say that, though I have voted against Orange incorporation in the past, I might not do so again.

Mr. Boyle moved the second reading of the Bill to prevent the practice of fraud by tree peddlers and commission men in the sale of nursery stock. In support of the Bill he referred to the fact that very extensive frauds had been perpetrated throughout the country in the sale of nursery stock by unprincipled agents. The circumstances surrounding this business were exceptional, because in the great majority of cases the fraud could not be discovered until years of labor and care had been expended in bringing the trees to the condition of fruiting.

Mr. Brown supported the Bill because the evidence taken before the Frauds Committee satisfied him that there was need of the farmers being protected by legislation from unscrupulous tree dealers.

Mr. Colter suggested that the Bill should apply to Canadian nurserymen as well as to Americans. He knew of instances where great wrongs had been inflicted through fraudulent representations on the part of Canadian tree growers. If the Canadians were honest they had nothing to fear from having the Bill amended as he proposed.

Mr. Barron opposed the Bill because it would prevent importation and would thus advance the price of nursery stock to the Canadian farmer. It was in fact only another way of introducing the protective principle. He moved the six months hoist.

The motion was lost and the Bill was read a second time.

Sir John Thompson moved that the Bill be referred to a select committee.

Mr. Wilson (Elgin) opposed the Bill because it would shut out American competition.

Mr. Charlton favored encouraging American competition. To exact $1 000 bonds from each agent of an American nursery grower was cowardly and unfair, and would provoke bad feeling between the two countries. He referred to the fact that on the threatened passage of this Bill last year a retaliatory measure was introduced in the New York Legislature proposing a duty of five cents a dozen on the importations of Canadian eggs.

Sir John Macdonald The Bill under consideration was introduced by the member for Mouck on his own responsibility and without any suggestion from the Government. It was foolish to say that we could not pass a measure which was believed to be for the interest of the country and to prevent frauds simply for fear of retaliatory action on the part of the United States.

Mr. Casey said this was a distinct challenge to the United States to retaliate.

Mr. Laurier said the title of the Bill was misleading. It was not a Bill to prevent fraud, but to prevent commerce of a certain kind between the two countries. There was no provision to prevent fraud, but simply to prevent trade. That was why the Opposition were against it.

Mr. Fisher said the Bill was a subterfuge to do away with the free interchange of shrubs and trees.

Mr. Sproule said there were undoubtedly frauds, and the House should endeavor to stop them.

Mr. Mills said it was perfectly hopeless to try to pass such a Bill at this time of the session.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Cook in moving for the second reading of the Bill to provide for the examination and licensing of persons employed as stationary engineers and all persons having charge of boilers, said that owing to the opposition to the Bill he proposed to amend it to provide that it would not apply to engines under 25 horse-power, and to exempt marine engineers. He hoped the Minister of Justice would not relegate this Bill to his slaughtering committee. (Laughter.

Mr. Tupper said the Bill was crude and ill-considered, as it failed to provide a staff to carry out its provisions. He moved the three months' hoist.

Mr. Ives considered the Bill to be a very mischievous and meddlesome one.

The amendment proposed by Mr. Tupper was carried

Mr. Wallace, in moving for the second reading of the Bill to suppress combinations in trade, said the importance of this question was being recognized not only in Canada, but in many other parts of the world. It was being found that all important industries were to a large extent being controlled by trusts and combinations. In binder twine there was a close combination disclosed last year. Since that time more objectionable facts had come to light. The manufacturers had increased the price of binder twine beyond all proportion. Though the raw material had not advanced in price, binder twine had been advanced 50 per cent. more than last year. It had also been disclosed that the coffin-makers had become a close corporation, by forming a combination. Since last year new combinations had been formed. On March 1st an agreement went into force to control Canadian salt. A syndicate was formed, and it bought the entire output of all the salt producers in Canada, paying them 70 cents a barrel instead of 55 cents, which they previously received. No sooner had this arrangement been effected than the price of salt was raised a hundred per cent. This was robbery to the farming community. These trusts were being formed every day. An insurance combination had raised the price of risks without any regard to the character of the hazard. The biscuits combination had forced up the price three or four cents per pound more than in the United States. Some persons said the remedy for this state of affairs was to be found in the tariff, and that was responsible for the trusts in Canada. He denied that. What had the tariff to do with the insurance combination? What had the tariff to do with the coal combination, which was the most iniquitous organization of them all? There was no combination in soft coal, upon which there was a duty.

Mr. Mills (Bothwell)—That is not so.

Mr. Wallace—The information sworn to before the committee said it was. What, he asked, had the tariff to do with the combination among the wholesale grocers? They were not manufacturers. What had the tariff to do with the salt combination, which was free when brought from the Old Country or for purposes of the fishermen? This iniquitous combination had nothing to do with the manufacturers but with the men who bought the product from them. It would be a great injustice to the manufacturer to remove his protection when a combination was formed by other parties. Many branches of business were quite prosperous without the aid of combinations. He proposed to amend the Bill now before the House by another amendment which had been offered to the original Bill. In reply to the contention that combinations promoted morality in trade he read a letter from a merchant in a large town, in which he charged that the members of combinations were untrue to their obligations, and that a system of rebates was practised among them. Canada had signified its approval of a Bill for the prevention of combines, and he hoped the measure would become law.

The Bill was read a second time.

Mr. Brown moved that the Bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. Guillet supported the Bill, because the essence and life of trade lay in free competition, while combinations forced up prices. The effect of combination would be to impoverish trade, drive out capital and ruin the people.

Mr. Mills advocated sending the Bill to the committee, because in its present shape it was unworkable and should not be made law.

Mr. Wallace opposed reference again to committee, because he believed it was simply an attempt to burke the Bill. No question had been more fully discussed throughout the country, and the House should be ready to take action.

After some further discussion the motion was carried, on the understanding that the House will have an opportunity to pass on the Bill during the session.

On the third reading of the Bill to amend the Fisheries Act,

Mr. Wilson (St. John) expressed doubts as to the constitutionality of the measure, as it proposed to take the rights from riparian proprietors, which were accorded by the courts.

Mr. Ellis moved for the three months' hoist

Mr. Mitchell said the Bill was an outrageous one, and should not be passed. It would sweep away riparian rights from thousands of people living alongside of the rivers in the Maritime Provinces, who had enjoyed the privilege for generations of placing nets in those waters under regulations passed by the department. The Bill was being pressed in the interest of foreign sportsmen, who were willing to pay liberally for the privilege of fly fishing for a few weeks. The riparian owners had inalienable rights which should not be so sacrificed for private ends.

Mr. Tupper said this Bill was in the interest of tidal fisheries, because it was evident that if unlimited and uncontrolled netting of salmon in their natural spawning grounds above tidal waters were allowed, the salmon fisheries in the tidal waters would be seriously injured. Statistics showed that in the fishing grounds contiguous to the non-tidal rivers of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, where netting was allowed, there had of late years been an alarming falling off in the catch of salmon. It was no object of the Federal Government to encourage fly fishing, the license fees for which were collected by the Local Government.

Mr. Weldon (St. John) said the Bill sought to deprive riparian owners of the right of netting, which had been declared to belong to them by the Supreme Court of New Brunswick. To take away that privilege had been declared to be an interference with property and civil rights.

The motion for the three months' hoist was lost on division—yeas 72, nays 108.

The Bill was read a third time.

The House resumed in committee on the Bill to amend the Franchise Act.

Mr. Bryan moved that a clause be added to provide that the wage-earners' qualification shall be $240 a year instead of $300.

The motion was lost.

The Bill passed through committee.

The House in committee on the resolutions providing rates of postage,

Mr. Haggart said he proposed to change the resolutions somewhat. The postage on local drop letters would be two cents per ounce in cities and towns, where letters were delivered by carriers. This would leave the law the same as at present except in such cities and towns. The second change was that periodicals published less frequently than at intervals of one month should be charged for. The third change was that printers' copy, manuscripts, maps, proofs, lithographs and photographs should be one cent for two ounces, which was double the charge at present, and similar to that charged in the United States and Great Britain. He also proposed to give postmasters power to register letters when it was supposed they contained valuable matter, and to collect the fee from the recipient.

Mr. Mitchell—Upon what principle do the Government act in increasing the postage of drop letters?

Mr. Haggart—Because it does not pay to deliver letters in cities for one cent.

Mr. Weldon (St. John) said this would be imposing a heavy burden on the people of cities.

Mr. Ferguson (Welland) thought it was only reasonable that the cities should pay for the privilege they received the benefit of.

Mr. Jones (Halifax) said this would interfere with the mercantile community of the cities. It seemed as if the Postmaster-General was trying to make up from the cities for deficiencies in the department.

Mr. Weldon (St. John) believed the revenue would be diminished by this increase of the fee

Mr. White (Renfrew) protested against compulsory registration. It seemed that the department proposed to act in a very arbitrary manner in saying that persons should be compelled to register matter sent through the post-office. If a man took the risk of sending valuables without registering it was his own business.

Mr. Haggart said that this system was in force in England and all over Europe.

Mr. McKay objected to the proposed increase in fees for drop letters. It was not just that the mercantile community should be called upon to make up for the deficiency in the department. The letter-carrying system paid for itself. He strongly protested against the proposed change, and believed it would lessen the revenue, as there were agencies in cities which delivered parcels and circulars at a rate which already brought them into competition with the postal system. He was satisfied that the increase of postage rates would give these agencies a great advantage in the competition.

Mr. Hesson believed cities should do more toward paying the burden of the postage system, and that the proposed change would meet with the approbation of the majority of the people.

The resolution passed, and the Bill based on it was introduced and referred to the committee.

Mr. Haggart stated that it was proposed to make the registration fee five cents all round for letters and packages.

Mr. Daly objected to the increase of the registration fee from two cents to five cents.

Mr. Haggart said he hoped to perfect the present system so as to make it more secure. An increase was necessary to effect that purpose.

Mr. Watson urged that the Minister consider the advisability of allowing municipalities to register tax papers at two cents.

Mr. Haggart said that the subject would be considered when the new regulations were framed.

Mr. Bowell, on moving the second reading of the Bill to amend the Customs Act, said he proposed to introduce amendments to cure several defects in the Act which he desired to avoid in future. One amendment provided that goods that had been entered for consumption or for warehouse, or that had been permitted to remain unclaimed in any intermediate country, should not be considered as being in transit through, but an importation from, such intermediate country. He desired also to amend the clause which provided for the confiscation of goods which are enclosed in a package and not mentioned in the invoice. He proposed to give the privilege to the importers in the case of goods which have so passed through and are afterwards discovered at once reporting the goods and amending the entry.

Mr. Paterson (Brant) said he wished again to refer to the proposal to add to the value for duty the cost of inland transportation in England and Ireland. These two countries had been exempted from the operation of the inland transport feature since 1879, and it was now proposed to remove that exemption. He thought it would be better to repeal entirely the clause in regard to adding these charges to the value for duty. The Americans has repealed that provision in their law in 1883 if the object of the imposition was to add to the revenue, he thought the better course to pursue would be to raise the duty. This provision would add materially to the burdens of the importers, and would injure Canadian carrying trade by ocean and rail. Besides it would work very unequally, as for instance, in the case of cutlery from Sheffield and of pottery from Staffordshire, the inland charges on which would be very disproportionate in the two cases to the actual cost.

Mr. Curran agreed with the views of the last speaker, and said he was supported by the mercantile community of the city of Montreal. The merchants there were of the opinion that it would be far better to increase the duty.

Mr. Bowell said Canadian shipping would not be injured by this regulation, because the value for duty would not include the ocean charges to Liverpool. If a Canadian ship entered into an arrangement to carry German goods from Liverpool, there would be no more charges added to the value for duty than if they had been shipped direct from the foreign port.

Sir Richard Cartwright asked if in case of goods shipped from Antwerp via Liverpool, there to be reshipped to Canada, the ocean charges to Liverpool would be added to the value for duty.

Mr. Bowell said that in such a case the charges would not be added. The value for duty would be the same whether the goods were shipped direct from Antwerp or by way of Liverpool. To repeal the clause altogether, as had been suggested, would affect the revenue to the extent of about a quarter of a million of dollars annually.

Mr. Holton asked how much additional revenue the Minister expected this additional duty would give him.

Mr. Bowell said he thought the increase would be about the same amount.

Mr. Paterson contended that though the Minister might construe the clause regarding inland transport charges in the way he had done, yet the reading of the clause plainly led to the belief that in the case cited the charges from Antwerp to Liverpool would be added. No less eminent a lawyer than one of the Minister's present colleagues, Mr. J. J. C. Abbott, had given a written opinion on this clause, which was as follows: "The point at which transportation ceases, the cost of which is to be added to the value for duty, seems to be the point at which the last shipment by water is made, by means of which the goods are expected to reach Canada."

The Bill was reported with the amendments indicated by the Minister.

Mr. Dewdney, in reply to inquiries, said the amount paid by the Government up to date on account of costs incurred in the case of the St. Catharines Milling & Lumbering Co vs. the Queen was $11,152, besides $5,000 paid to the Crown solicitors in London, making $16,152 in all. It was not the intention of the Government to pay the costs incurred by the Ontario Government in this case, except those which were awarded by the courts.

Mr. Wilson (Elgin) inquired if it was the intention of the Government during the present session to increase the duty on pork.

Mr. Mulock inquired if it was intended to take any steps towards meeting the demands of the millers for an increased duty on flour.

Mr. Foster said, in reply to both inquiries, that they were of such a nature that it would not be advisable in the public interest that he should give an answer.

Mr. Vanasse inquired whether the Government were aware that certain cheese dealers in the United States are in the habit of marking on cheese exported by them to England via Montreal the words "Canadian Product," greatly to the detriment of the real Canadian article in the English market, and he asked if the Government propose to adopt means to put an end to this fraud, which involves consequences greatly prejudicial to the Canadian producer.

Sir John Macdonald said the subject had been brought to the attention of the Government, and they were now considering whether or not steps could be taken to prevent a repetition of the fraud in future.

On a question regarding the inspection of milk, Mr. Costigan said it was intended at first to introduce this session a Bill on this subject, but on consultation with the dairymen who were here at the late convention, the Government found it to be a more difficult matter than was at first supposed, so it was decided to postpone the matter until next session, when a comprehensive measure would be introduced to insure the delivery of unadulterated material to the creameries.

On the postal estimates, Mr. Haggart stated that the deficit was due to the increased accommodation necessary to meet the extension of the service. Mr. Jones asked if it were true that the English mails were to be sent now by New York, as was reported. Mr. Haggart replied that the contract with the Allan Line expired to-day and that, to prevent the possibility of delay, or the probability of the Allans refusing to carry the mails, a telegram was sent by his deputy to postmasters to send the mails by New York. It was since arranged with the Allans to send the mails by their lines until such time as new arrangements were made.

WHERE'S THE NAVY?

A Dominican War Vessel Chases a United States Schooner and Fires on Her.

A New York despatch says: Captain Stubbs, of the schooner Carrie A. Bucknam, which arrived yesterday from St. Domingo City, reports that on March 21st, when off Saona Island, he sighted a vessel steaming towards his vessel from the land, then distant six or eight miles. The craft proved to be a Dominican war vessel. She laid her course to intercept the Bucknam, but could not do so owing to a strong breeze, and fell astern half or three-quarters of a mile. When nearly in the schooner's wake she fired a shot, which struck the water only a few yards from the Bucknam's stern. She then gave chase, but with a good strong breeze the schooner distanced her. After keeping up the chase for two hours she gave it up and steamed for the land. She was a three-masted steamer of about 500 tons. Her decks were crowded with men. What her errand was can only be conjectured, as the Bucknam was far outside of their jurisdiction and on the high seas. The American flag was flying at the schooner's peak all the time, it having been hoisted as soon as the steamer was made out to be a war vessel.

Farmer Nagle's Prayer of Faith.

A Hawkinsville (Ga.) despatch says: Andrew Nagle, a farmer on the line of Sumter county, went to Americus the other day in an unsuccessful effort to make a loan. He returned home on Friday night, retired to the orchard, and prayed for relief. During the night he dreamed about overhauling some old plunder left in the barn by his deceased father. Early Saturday morning he was so impressed by his dream that he made the examination, and in turning over an old crock a piece of money dropped out. In the crock he found $200 in $20 gold pieces and 50 silver dollars. He is now engaged in overhauling the entire plantation.

FREDERICK T. ROBERTS, M. D., Professor of Clinical Medicine at University College Hospital, London, England, says: "Bright's disease has no symptoms of its own and may long exist without the knowledge of the patient or practitioner and no pain will be felt in the kidneys or their vicinity." Ordinary common kidney diseases, many times unrecognized as such, will become chronic and terminate in Bright's (organic) disease of the kidneys, unless taken in hand. Warner's Safe Cure is the only recognized specific that has ever been discovered for this disease. The late Dr. Dio Lewis said, over his own signature: "If I found myself the victim of a serious kidney trouble, I would use Warner's Safe Cure."

THE IRISH QUESTION.

Sir Charles' Eloquent Peroration—Secret Circulars and Battering Rams.

A London cable says: In his peroration, which lasted half an hour, before the Parnell Commission, Sir Charles Russell said: In opening our case I said we represented the accused. The positions are now reversed. The accused sit there (pointing with indignant scorn at Mr. Walter and Mr. McDonald, of the Times). This inquiry will not vindicate individuals, but it will remove misconception of the character, action and motives of the Irish people and their leaders. It will set earnest, honest minds to thinking, and will hasten true union and effect a true reconciliation. It will dispel the weighty clouds that have darkened the history of a noble race and dimmed the glory of a mighty empire.

At the conclusion of the speech Mr. Gladstone and other friends warmly congratulated Sir Charles Russell and Mr. Parnell and Mr. Davitt.

In the House of Commons, this evening Professor Stewart (Radical) asked Mr. Balfour whether the circular sent to the Irish Police directing them to collect all the secret information regarding the doings of members of the National League was designed to aid the London Times.

Mr. Balfour replied that he made it a rule neither to own nor to deny the truth of allegations regarding the issue of secret circulars.

Mr. Parnell demanded a straightforward answer. The circular, he said, was a fact. If it was intended for Government purposes Mr. Balfour had nothing to conceal. His refusal to explain implied that there was something to be ashamed of. (Hear, hear.) The use made of the circular proved that the Government were not neutral toward the commission investigating the Times' charges. They were the prosecutors behind the Times.

Referring to the use of battering rams in forcing evictions in Donegal, Mr. Parnell protested against such cruelty and barbarity.

Mr. Balfour ignored the question regarding the secret circular. Regarding the battering rams, he held that it was necessary to use them as the tenants had built elaborate fort works inside their doors.

Sir William Vernon Harcourt described the policy of Mr. Balfour as one of extermination. The Government's remedy for the suffering tenants was to level the poor people's houses with battering rams.

Mr. Goschen declared that the Parnellites were responsible for that. They had substituted warfare between landlord and tenant for friendly relations based upon recent laws which put Irish tenants in a more favored and protected position than any other people in the world. Evictions were not taking place because tenants could not pay their rents, but because they would not do so. Sir William Vernon Harcourt seemed to prefer that policemen's heads should be battered in to seeing a door broken.

BRODIE OUTDONE.

Meredith Stanley Makes the Most Remarkable Leap on Record.

A Cincinnati despatch says: Meredith Stanley, well-known athlete and bridge jumper here, yesterday made the most remarkable leap on record. It was from the famous high bridge on the Cincinnati Southern Railroad over the Kentucky River. The height is 285 feet. He selected a place where the water was 12 feet deep. Attired in silk tights and slippers he slipped into the air and doubling up his body like a ball, fell to the water and a moment later bounded to the surface, where he was quickly seized by assistants in a boat. He coughed blood for a little while but soon recovered and took the train for Cincinnati. He says the feat is done by knowing how and by perfect self-confidence. He escaped without breaking the skin, and to-day says he feels as well as ever. The bridge is the highest in the world except one.

Improvements at the Falls.

A despatch from Niagara Falls, Ont., says: In addition to the improvements now being made at Queen Victoria Niagara Falls Park, noted in the TIMES a few days ago, there is the Canadian tunnel under the great Falls. The tunnel commences at the end of the present walk that runs from the elevator, ending underneath the edge of the Falls, and from this point runs inwards into the mass of rock, then turning parallel with the Falls, will run to and under their edge at a point above the boiling foam and below the centre of the great mass of green-lined water which, at a depth of twelve feet, breaks over the precipice. The tunnel will be about 300 feet long, 7 feet high and over 5 feet wide, being blasted out of a seam of shale or slate rock. Immediately above this strata is the well-known 30-foot solid seam of Queenston grey rock, giving untold strength overhead. At the further end of the tunnel, under the Falls, it is intended to cut out a sufficient space so that large parties of visitors can stand and view the immense volume of water as it thunders downward into the river below. Mr. Charles Patton, the contractor, says the tunnel will be finished in time for the heavy excursion season.

Carried Off a Saw Mill.

A Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., despatch says Moiles Brothers, who owned mill property at Detour, Mich., against which Buffalo parties held a mortgage of $45,000, have removed their plant to the Canada side, and defy the mortgagees as well as the officers of the law, who report that Moiles is safe in Canada. The tug with the sheriff reached Detour just in time to see the Moiles fleet safe in Canadian waters. They reached Cockburn Island and anchored there. When the sheriff approached the Moiles told him they would fill him with cold lead if he attempted to take them, as they were then over five miles in Canadian waters. Nothing could be done. As the fleet crossed the Canadian line the crew cheered and fired guns. They will lie at Cockburn until the ice is gone.

Easter's Crowning Glory.

The seats are taken, every one,
My heart is beating in my ear;
The sermon is but just begun.
I look around—she must be here!
Ah, no—alas! Her place I see
Filled by a maiden strange to me.

And all at once how empty seems
The crowded space; how dim and cold
The tender morning light that streams
Through windows stained in blue and gold.
The carven cherubs look quite glum.
And even the organ pipes seem dumb

The preacher tells of peace and bliss
Of Easter joy. Ah, well, no doubt
Some other sinner will not miss
The comfort that he talked about.
For me, my altar surmise is bare
Since my fair saint's smiles not there.

What's this? A sweet face turned my way,
A gently welcoming look, dear eyes!
Ah, now, indeed, my prayer I'll say,
And now the preacher's words seem wise.
To think my love I did not know
Her Easter bonnet changed her so.

NOW IN THE SPRING OF THE YEAR.

During Winter, Nature wisely arranges that we should live on foods containing much fat, or, as they are known, hydrocarbons, for the purpose of supplying heat to the body; the chemical operation necessary to transform fat into heat is the exclusive work of the liver, and so during the time stated it is constantly congested.

With the approach of warm weather our diet changes to muscle-producing food, and the work of the liver is much lessened. In the majority of cases, however, it is ℔ unable to completely throw off the excess of bile, but remains congested, causing that ℔ lazy, tired feeling which many have in the Spring months, when the weather becomes warm.

℔ This is evidence of an unhealthy condition, and though people appreciate the necessity of an alterative at this period the common idea is to take drastic pills and produce a cathartic effect, only to make matters ℔ worse. The liver must be unloaded, and its proper action restored before hot weather, if you wish to ℔ preserve health, and if this distinct call of nature is unheeded serious results will occur.

℔ The blood will become loaded with bile and lithic acid, and as ℔ every drop of vital fluid passes through the kidneys to be purified, they soon break down and are unable to carry out the deadly poison. Warner's Safe Cure and Warner's Safe Pills have not only a ℔ specific action on the kidneys, but on the ℔ liver also.

℔ They thin the thickened bile so that it will pass out through its ducts, enable the glands to unload themselves, act as a solvent on all biliary acids and in a word ℔ fit these great organs for the season's work, ℔ preventing blood poisoning, inflammation, abscess, and all affections to which they are so liable.

℔ As you value the blessings of health, do not allow the summer to approach without giving your system a "general house-cleaning," in the manner we have indicated.

A QUEER FAMILY.

In a Fit of Anger a Son Remains in a Room for Fourteen Years.

There is no more peculiar family than the Glenns, two sisters and a brother, who live in Urbana, O. All are unmarried, and John, the brother, is a study. There were once three boys. The father was odd. He would never go in debt. Once he went to buy the boys a coat each, but his money gave out and he only got two. He told John the circumstances and said he would get him one next time. John got mad, said he need never buy him one, and that he would never wear one so long as his father lived. Going to his room, John remained fourteen years without a coat, and no one ever saw him out of that room. His meals were sent to him, and he sat there and read and thought. When the father died John came out, put on a coat, and went to the funeral. The Van Wert (O.) News says the Glens are Scotch-Irish. The coat-of-arms ornaments the silver, china and front door. The old man had money and bought largely of land, and the estate is one of the most valuable in Champaign county. After the father died the children, none of whom ever married, although all had been carefully educated, decided to have the whole house frescoed. For ten months an artist worked at the house, and the walls are covered with grotesque figures, serpents and animals. John got mad once about these decorations and shut himself in his room for four years, coming out to attend the funeral of the brother who had provoked him. Mary, the youngest sister, has charge of the finances now. John is 65 years old, and bleached white by his confinement.

A Fable for Young Wives.

Men are naturally less amiable and more intractable than women. The first point, therefore, to secure a married woman's happiness after the holidays of the honeymoon are over, is that she study carefully the peculiarities of her husband's temper. It is in the power of a wise and good woman to make a lamb of the greatest bear that ever wore whiskers: while by a foolish treatment the process may be reversed and a generous-hearted creature, with all the capabilities of a lion, may end in being a bear or a wolf. A wife must tread on her husband's temper first as cautiously as a prudent boy does upon recently-formed ice. Only when she has learned where the slippery humor of her husband will bear and where it will break can she perform with safety those graceful evolutions by which a devoted wife achieves greater triumphs than ever Bonaparte did by his artillery. Wise old Plutarch, descanting on the topic, very appropriately brings in the old fable of the traveller, whom Boreas, with his obstreperous blasts, tried to disrobe of his good great-coat, but the result was quite otherwise, the more violently Boreas puffed his cheeks the more closely the man wrapped his cloak about him. But what Boreas could not achieve with all his strength the sun did with a few slight touches of his genial beams. The man was so overcome by the softening influence that he flung both cloak and tunic away. So let no woman so foolishly attempt to gain from her husband in rough way what she can surely gain by gentleness.

A Far-Reaching Change.

Executions by electricity will necessitate many changes in expression. "The dull, sickening thud," will become the "shuddering shock;" a criminal will no longer be "launched into eternity," but "wired to another world."

QUEER CRANKS.

Funny Folks With Strange Notions and Habits.

A patient visited Dr. Hammond one day, says the New York Tribune, and sat quietly talking for a short time. Suddenly she walked across the room and overturned a chair, after which she resumed her seat and talked as quietly and rationally as before.

"Why did you throw over that stool?" asked Dr. Hammond.

"I don't know," was the answer.

"Do you know that you did throw it down?"

"Oh, yes, I know."

"Then why did you do it?"

"I was obliged to. I cannot tell you any more. I had no wish to do it, but it irritated me, and after I had thrown it down I felt perfectly satisfied. This often happens with me."

Another girl was not insane, and entirely free from any hereditary taint, and was haunted by a singular verse:

My father and mother were both insane,
And I inherit the dreadful stain
My grandfathers, grandmothers, aunts and uncles
Were lunatics all and had carbuncles.

Night and day this verse pursued her. Going about her duties and pleasures she mentally hummed it to every tune she had ever heard, sometimes emphasizing one word and sometimes another, sometimes fast, sometimes slow, and with every conceivable kind of variation. Often when spoken to she would wait to mentally finish a line before replying.

"Cranks," said a young doctor who was for some time house surgeon in the "The Retreat," in Virginia, "are as numerous as the flowers of spring. I knew one young woman who was well balanced except for a certain wish to crucify the flesh, which led her to do the most unheard of things. She was very wealthy, and one time when she was ill she requested to be taken to a hospital and placed in bed between two paupers. Nothing could make her see the folly of her wish, and, as she was her own mistress, she was obeyed. Another patient of mine had such an aversion to dirt that a speck upon a window pane would almost throw her into convulsions. She frequently spent three hours at a time washing her hands: she would take no money unless it was enclosed in an envelope, and would not touch a chair or table unless her hands were gloved."

Another physician tells of a man who never buys any article singly. He may only want one book, but an irresistible impulse makes him buy two or four or half a dozen and frequently copies of that same work. He may only require one umbrella stand, but two or three are sure to be sent home, and they must not be relegated to the garret either, until his fancy for umbrella stands has faded, to be replaced by something else—hardware or music stools, as the case may be. This man, by the way, is at the head of a flourishing business house, and he is considered sensible and thoroughly practical except for this weakness, which has earned for him the nickname of "General Plurality."

A good old lady who was born with a silver spoon in her mouth has all her life envied poor women their washtub. To do one's own washing she considers the greatest privilege that could fall to the lot of a human being. This is not one of the fancies of old age, for it has been her pet hobby all her life. Now she sits propped up in pillows all day long, and the only way to induce her to take her medicine is to place a doll's washtub on the satin coverlet and let her trifle with a few pieces of muslin on her miniature washboard.

Facts and Fancies.

London's police force numbers 11,252 men.

There are but sixteen female doctors in Paris.

Kansas City has sixty miles of cable road, representing an investment of $21,000,000.

A locomotive to be operated solely by electricity is being constructed at Rome, N. Y.

A red beard ten feet in length is said to grace the physiognomy of Louis Goulan, a forge-master in Allier, France.

Philadelphia is now the only city in the States which gives profitable patronage to a permanent company of minstrels.

Some one commending Philip of Macedon for drinking freely: "That," said Demosthenes, "is a good quality in a sponge, but not in a king."

A small leasehold property in Worcestershire, England, is announced for sale by auction, held "for the residue of a term of 2,000 years created in the year 1600."

The tall female hat now so agitates the minds of the male frequenters of the London pits that it is proposed that the pit should be divided like a Quaker meeting house, the men sitting on one side and the women on the other.

The Chicago Herald says: "C. W. Russell, a prominent business man, who has an office in the Builders' Exchange building, wears the biggest hat in town, if not in the entire country. He is a large, well proportioned man, and one would not for a moment imagine he wore an 8¾ hat. It is a fact, however."

Personal Points.

Gen. James Longstreet, the old Confederate officer, is living in Washington in the best of health.

The late John Bright was a great admirer of John G. Whittier's poetry, and he frequently repeated "Snowbound" in public.

Among the portraits on the walls in the study of the late John Bright is one of Gladstone, one of Washington, and one of Lincoln. He did much of his work with the reminders of congenial spirits around him.

Notwithstanding his age—88 years—or his deafness, Count von Moltke is as devoted as ever to music, and seldom misses a court concert or any musical entertainment of importance. But he rarely now touches the piano, upon which he used to be a first-rate performer.

In Lincoln Cathedral, in the course of repair, the grave has been opened of Bishop Oliver Sutton, who occupied the see from 1280 to 1299. A silver-gilt chalice and paten in perfect preservation were found on the right side of the mouldering skeleton; also a large gold ring set with rock crystal.

ANCIENT SUPERIOR.

The Oldest of the Great Chain of American Lakes.

Mr. A. T. Drummond, in recent Canadian publications, takes the view that Lake Superior is the most ancient of the St. Lawrence great lakes, dating back to Cambrian, and, it may be, earlier times, and that while its waters at perhaps more than one period found an outlet to the ocean through the Mississippi valley, the lake formed in other ages one of the sources of a great river system which terminated on the Atlantic seaboard. He traces the course of this river from the Michigan basin, and from Lake Superior across Lake Huron to the headlands at the entrance of the Georgian Bay. Here its waters were hurled over the cliffs in a great fall, more than rivalling Niagara. At the lower level another considerable stream joined it from the north, and the united rivers then skirted the face of the continuous, shaly-precipitous cliffs which cross Ontario to the Lake Ontario valley. Following the course of the escarpments which they created in this valley, the waters eventually reached the sea through the Mohawk and Hudson rivers. At a recent period the elevation of the land between the Georgian Bay and Lake Ontario blocked the course of the river, and, filling the Georgian Bay with water, created a new outlet, not by the present St. Clair River, which was of later birth, but to the southeastward of Lake Huron, where, through a channel now buried by clays, the Erie basin was reached. The course from this basin to the Ontario valley was through the great fracture in the limestones at Hamilton, and not over the Niagara Falls. The change in the flow of these waters to the Niagara River was one of the opening episodes in the later history of Lake Erie. The Ottawa River was at this time a large stream flowing in much in the same course as now, while the St. Lawrence was a less important river, taking its rise in the Adirondack Mountains, which, at their then great elevation, blocked the present outlet of Lake Ontario.—Nature.

Origin of Great Inventions.

Glass.—Known in Egypt 1740 B. C.

Bellows.—Egyptian; used 1490 B. C.

Needles.—First made in England, 1545.

Oxygen.—Discovered by Priestly, 1774

Candles.—Made of tallow; used in 1290.

Cotton gin.—Made by Eli Whitney, 1793.

Engraving.—Invented by Chinese, 1,000 B. C.

Clocks.—Water clocks used in Rome 158 B. C.

Hydrogen.—First isolated by Cavendish, 1766.

Thermometer.—Credited to Santario, of Padua, 1609.

Barometer.—Evangelista Torricella, invented 1643

Air pump.—Made by Otto Guericke, of Magdeburg, 1650.

Anemometer.—Invented 1709, by Wolfino, to measure force of wind.

Barbers.—Great antiquity, mentioned in Ezekiel v. 1, about 594 B. C.

Billiards.—Ascribed to Henrique Devigne, who lived in the reign of Charles IX. of France.

Algebra.—Arabian origin; known in Europe, 1300, used generally, 1590. Luca Borgo's book, 1494.

Plain Scotch.

Travellers on the Argyllshire coach which ran between Lochgilphead and Strachur will remember well old Donald Campbell, one of the chattiest and most genial of drivers. One day the following dialogue took place between Campbell and a Cockneified tourist who pointed to some heaps of dried mud by the roadside which had been gathered up by some men employed in cutting out the roadside drains, and said: "Hi say, driver, wot h'are these?" "Oh these are humplocks o' glaur." "H'and wot's a humplock o' glaur?" "Oh, just a pickle drookit stour." "Ho! by Jingo! ow funny, h'and wot's a pickle drookit stour?" "Oh, just a neivfu' o' clart." The Cockney asked no more questions. New York Scottish American.

A Blood-Thirsty Parson.

The TIMES finds this in the Gazette, published in Burlington, Iowa: Mr. F. F. Kiner, who prides himself on the appellation of "the fighting chaplain," exclaimed at the People's Opera House last night that "should I ever meet the overseer of the Shiloh prison I would kill him, so help me God!" This expression would be most natural from a poor sinner, and would be the just punishment the brute deserved, but coming from the lips of a minister of the gospel it was hardly in keeping with a follower of one whose mission on earth was to bring "peace on earth and good will to men," nor with the admonition to His followers to return good for evil.

Some Curious Misnomers.

Arabic figures were invented by the Indians, not by the Arabs.

Dutch clocks are not of Dutch but German (deutsch) manufacture.

Irish stew is a dish unknown in Ireland.

Baffin's Bay is no bay at all.

Catgut is the gut of sheep, not of cats.

Down is used instead of a-down, and utterly perverts its meaning. The Saxon dun is a hill, and a-dun is its opposite, a descent. Going down stairs really means going up stairs. We ought properly to say "going a-down."

Sassiety.

"Awfully common lot of people here to-night, don't you think so, Snobby?"

Mr. Snobby—I don't know. We've got a retired fishmonger; he's rather fishy, I acknowledge. But then we've got the second cousin of an Honorable. Then there's Smith; he's got a friend who is very intimate with some one who knows a Baronet. So it's not so bad, after all.—Once a Week.

Slightly Opposed to Children.

Janitor—Have you any children, sir? Mr. Kidby—Yes, three. "I can't let you have this flat then." "But my children are all married." "It doesn't make no difference." "They live out in Chicago." "Can't help it, sir; the owner says he won't rent to nobody who has children under no circumstances."

In That Case the Truth Will Do.

Mrs. Brief (who has been reading an article on sleep in a health paper)—John, is it best to lie on the right side or the left?

John (a lawyer)—If you are on the right side, it usually isn't necessary to lie at all.

NOT TO BE TRIED.

An Experiment that Might Result Disastrously.

A woman, whom she once met on the train, told Lydia Jackson Lamphere how she kept her husband from smoking. "On our wedding day," she said, "I made what I called a declaration of principles to my husband. I said to him that it was my purpose to make his conduct my guide in all respects; that in our family there would be no separate standards, and whatever he would think right for himself should be right for me." You see what was coming. "One evening supper was over, the shades drawn and the lamp lighted, and we were seated for an evening of reading or sewing, when my husband took up his pipe for an evening smoke. Seeing this, I calmly drew from my pocket a pipe, which I began to fill with tobacco exactly as he was doing. As he proceeded, so did I. I coolly scratched a match, lighted the pipe and took a whiff." Well, as the woman told Lydia the story—the husband, of course, gave up. Good story as far as it goes, but I can't help thinking what, oh, suffering sisters, what would have happened if that kind-hearted husband had not relented, but had kept on smoking, and permitted—invited—nay, urged his wife to join him? What kind of an evening would they—that is, what kind of an evening would she have enjoyed? Oh, sisters, never, no matter what Lydia Lamphere's friend tells you, never try that cure on your husbands—your prospective husbands, that is. It won't work, with all men. It would cure one of you of smoking, that I am sure of, but it would not be he. You may safely try it, if you are fond of excitement of a rather lump and stringy kind, it won't kill you, even if you do take your first smoke with a briar pipe and nigger head tobacco. But you can produce the same effect upon yourself with a milder drug. I tremble especially about the shoulders when I think what awful scenes may be precipitated in happy homes by the fallacious theories taught in this story. Why, sister, I have seen a boy, a great, strong rough boy, 14 years old, so wrought upon by a mild five-cent cigar, not more than half smoked, that he has stretched himself supinely upon the cold bosom of the inhospitable earth and waited with an unconcern that would chill your blood for death, his father, or the doctor to come along, and didn't care a cent which got the first whack at him. And when you think of a grown up woman, a married woman, mother of children, may be, starting in on a pipe—well, I don't want to think of it, that's all. I've got to go to bed some time to-night, and I can rest just as well without the nightmare as I can with it and not "holler" till I wake up the whole house. But I cannot close without a parting word of warning. Don't you listen to Lydia Lamphere on this question, for she's your friend, and I don't want you to turn against her. You take the advice of a man who knows more about pipes than you do about husbands, and don't you go to smoking in order to break him of it. Even if you don't die, you might learn to like it as well as he does, and then where would you be, if he should want to quit? Don't you smoke pipes, you chew gum, if you must do something wicked. You can worry the immortal life out of him with that if you'll only keep at it, and talk and chew a great deal at the same time. That's very effective. You keep the quid and your jaws going and he'll give up drinking, chewing, smoking, betting, sure—no, he'll grow worse about that, but he'll give up everything else—unless, in a furious spasm of insanity, he breaks your jaws with a cricket bat and jumps off the bridge at the end of the third week. Boston Beacon.

Charms of Amateur Theatricals.

Though a young man, he was to play the father, and the daughter chanced to be a very handsome woman. So when he forgot his part, he could think of nothing better while holding his "child" than to say:

"Kiss your father."

And each time when he felt that his memory was about to fail he would save himself by crying out:

"Come to my arms, my child."

The husband of the daughter was heard to say that he thought the author repeated himself very often.

Quite a Joke on Her.

Corker—You know my wife waits up for me every night. Well, I fooled her in great shape the night of April 1st.

Waters—What did you do, stay out all night?

Corker (chuckling)—No, by cracky. I came home sober.

Not So Funny.

Editor (looking at joke)—That's funny. Contributor—Yes, I thought so. Editor—I don't mean that. It's funny that you should think such a thing as that funny.

Quite Impossible.

He—So you think the missing link will never be found? She—It is impossible. He—Why impossible? She—Because when found it will not be the missing link.

One-thirtieth of the whole population of Iceland emigrated last year.

Door-knobs and bell-handles of the famous are now being collected as souvenirs in London, imitating the old fashion of preserving the knockers of the great houses.

Consolation.

When Molly came home from the party to-night—
The party was out at nine—
There were traces of tears in her bright blue eyes
That looked mournfully up to mine.

For some one had said, she whispered to me,
With her face on my shoulder hid,
Some one had said (there were sobs in her voice)
That they didn't like something she did.

So I took my little girl upon my knee—
I am old and exceedingly wise—
And I said, "My dear, now listen to me
Just listen, and dry your eyes.

"This world is a difficult world indeed,
And people are hard to suit,
And the man who plays on the violin
Is a bore to the man with the flute

"And I myself have often thought
How very much better 'twould be
If every one of the folks that I know
Would only agree with me.

"But since they will not, the very best way
To make this world look bright,
Is never to mind what people say,
But to do what you think is right."

"The Naked Truth."

Whilst Truth was one day bathing in a limpid river, Falsehood happened to pass, and noticing the garments of Truth on the bank of the stream, conceived the idea of exchanging his clothing for that of the bather, who came from the bath and mourned the loss sustained, but, disdaining Falsehood's garb, has since gone naked through the world. Whether the origin of the expression "the naked truth"—is mythical or otherwise, it is universally known to be the "naked truth" that Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery has no equal as a curative agent for consumption (lung scrofula), bronchitis, chronic nasal catarrh, asthma and kindred diseases of the throat and lungs.

Worth the Money.

The Spring Assizes for the County of Grey will open at Owen Sound before Justice Macmahon on Monday, May 6th.

Mt. Forest Rep.—A fine cow belonging to Mr. J. C. Wilkes was found dead in its stall Monday, with a broken neck. The animal in trying to get at some hay in the next stall slipped, and her neck, which was caught in between opening in the board partition, was in that way broken.

Mr. Wm Dixon, of Black's Corners, while chopping in the bush last Thursday, sustained a broken leg. A tree in falling struck against another and then rebounded, crushing Mr. Dixon against a stump, with the above result. The injured man was brought to Shelburne, where his injuries were attended to, and he is now doing as well as could be expected.—Shelburne Economist.

Mr. Ed. McMahon, of Normanby, has lately secured a well earned pension from the United States Government, for service rendered, and afflictions endured during the American War. Mr. McMahon was a Lieut., and although he escaped the bullets and swords of the enemy pretty well he was taken down with the yellow fever, which with other causes partially shattered his health. The pension amounts to about $100 a year and will likely be raised as it is what is known as a half pension.—Grey Review.

A curious case of strychnine poisioning is reported from Shringley. It appears that James Phillips was returning from Dundalk with a man from Badjeros on Tuesday and on the way home this man offered Phillips some biscuits of which he was partaking. After supper Mr. Phillips took sick very suddenly and in the night his friend thought he was dying. A doctor was sent for who diagnosed the case as strychnine poisioning giving no hopes for recovery. The latest reports however are more assuring and we are pleased to learn he is getting well. How he got the poison is as yet unknown.—Creemore Star.

A number of sharp women, claiming to represent a Chicago firm, are canvassing the neighboring countries with the pretended object of introducing a new kind of soap. They called at houses and left a cake as a sample, asking that it be tried and the result noted. In a couple of days the women will return and ask the lady of the house to sign a printed testimonial to its excellence, which is to be handed to the grocers to induce them to handle the soap. These testimonials generally turn up as orders for from $2 to $10 worth of soap at big prices. The wording is very ingenious, and many ladies will sign it without any idea that it is anything else than what it purports to be.—Creemore Star.

A Unique Craft.

THE "ALLIGATOR" THAT SWIMS IN THE WATER AND CRAWLS ON LAND.

SIMCOE, April 13. Messrs. West & Peachey have completed a tug for Mr. Joseph Jackson to be run on French river and center lakes in the Muskoka region. The vessel is a curiosity and certainly unique of its kind, being intended to run both on land and water. It is intended for the lumbering business, and not only propels itself in the water at a speed of five miles an hour, but also over portages, being provided with runners, drum and cable, by means of which and a hitching post the land journeys will be made. It is 10x30 feet, 4 feet hold, 20 horse power engine, geared 6 to 1, thus giving 100 horse power strain on the cable. It weighs thirty tons, and is propelled in the water by two side paddle wheels. When moving over a portage these and the rudder will be raised by means of screws. The boiler is horizontal, swung on a pivot, so that the water will remain level when ascending or descending an elevation. One man operates the whole affair from the wheelhouse. A large concourse of spectators from town and country witnessed the launch on Silver Lake a few days ago. The cable was made fast to a tree, the steam turned on and the Alligator, as the craft is aptly called, crawled slowly to the water's edge, into which it glided, and several trial trips demonstrated the complete success of the design. The cable was again made fast to a tree and the vessel crawled out of the water back to the dockyard, where it remained until yesterday, when steam was again made, and by the help of the trees along the street the "Alligator" crawled at no snail's pace to the G.T.R. depot, to be shipped to the Muskoka country, where its practical work is to begin in tugging logs and timber for its owner.

THE HERALD'S BUGBEAR.

Mr. Hall of the Dundalk Herald howled with rage last week at our audacity in questioning his statements with regard to C.P.R. monopoly, and proceeded to attempt to prove that his allegations were sound. In his anguish he appealed to "three of the heaviest shippers along the line (telegraph pole shippers) who primed him up with false information and he shot it off through the Herald without the least misgiving as to the powerful quality of his amunition. Two of these gentlemen informed him that the rates from Dundalk to Suspension Bridge were 15½ cents per 100 and a third informed him they had been lowered 2 cents. This latter information was a fact—the rate from Dundalk is 13½ cents. We admit that there is considerable difference between this and 10 cents from Durham, but the Herald forgot to inform its readers that poles from Dundalk or Flesherton had to be shipped over two lines of railway—viz., C.P.R. to Parkdale and thence by G.T.R. to Bridge, whereas the Grand Trunk have a through line from the points mentioned on its line where the rate is 10 cents. The poles shipped from Dundalk and other stations along this line are carried for the greater part of the distance by the same railway which the Herald says ships so cheaply. The C.P.R. has a very small portion of that rate of 13½ cents. We are inclined to think the Herald man had never thought this matter out himself, when he gave us the gratuitous advice to "gather some information in the shape of facts before indulging in sneers at a cotem because it saw fit to speak out in the interests of the hard-working farmers of its locality." When The Advance does search for facts it gets them, because it searches in the proper quarter and does not rely upon hearsay for important information like the matter in question.

But what has become of the Herald's other charges? It lets them severely alone, as well it may. Its information that the company had raised its passenger rates has not yet been recognized by the traveling public. As for the statement that the Company would only furnish cars for certain kinds of freight—well, that is too absurd to be seriously considered.

The whole fact of the matter is, the Herald simply raged because we held up his philanthropic ? statements to ridicule, and his wail of injured innocence will no doubt be highly appreciated by the "hard-working farmers" in his constituency.

We have shown that it is not a "monopoly" which causes the high freight rates on ties and telegraph poles. Bring on some other charge, Mr. Hall. Your bugbear is not too large to tackle. Also tell us what politics have to do with freight rates on this line, as you charge our defensive zeal to political interests.

The Owen Sound Advertiser of last week treats the Toronto World to a scathing editorial of a column in length. At the Assizes lately in Toronto the case for libel brought by Commissioner Armstrong of the Board of License Commissioners was dropped in considertion of the World paying all costs ($200) and publishing an ample apology, "and," says the Advertiser, "it did publish it. The World is used to publishing apologies. It has done it so often that no one now places any reliance on its vaporings." "Them's our sentiments tew," as the good district fathers remarked. The World's day of usefulness and truthfulness had passed just about the time it began to make its compositors hang around on an average of 3 hours a day for their pay, which same was within nine months after the thing had been cheekily thrust into life. Our disgust at the small characters who run that paper is fully devoloped. We know the miniature-souled crew too well. One of the family managed to secure B.A. at Toronto University, and so soon as that was acquired a brother tramp print was called in off the road, and a four dollar reporter threw up a situation on one of the big dailies, and The World was launched on a capital of mighty small proportions, but with an unlimited quantity of gall, and a whisky odor that is still sticking to it. The World is a very "sore head" Conservative sheet, Mr. Advertiser, owing to the conceit of its manager. Any further particulars will be cheerfully furnished.

Those feverish-minded individuals who endured such terrible hardships to secure land in the Oklahoma country appear already to rue their rashness. The reaction has quickly taken place, and thousands who are able are returning with tales of woe and suffering. The land, it is now claimed, is very poor, and disease plentiful.

Another Railway Horror.

Through the engine of the St. Louis express on the G.W. division of the G.T.R. leaving the rails when entering Hamilton Sunday morning twenty lives were lost, nearly the entire train was destroyed by fire and a number of passengers and trainmen were injured.

The killed were burned to such an extent that it is impossible to identify them. No Canadians, so far as known, are among the killed. The scene at the wreck when the charred bodies were being removed was too awful for description. This accident occurred near the scene of the Desjardines horror.

The train which met such a terrible fate was the Limited Express from Chicago, No. 52, due in Hamilton at 7 a.m., and was unusually heavy, a large number of the passengers being on their way to the Centennial celebration at New York.

The train left Detroit about midnight on Saturday and consisted of an engine, two baggage cars, one smoking car, one Wabash passenger coach, one Chicago & G.T.R. passenger coach, the Wagner sleeping car Fitchburg, one first class G.T.R. car, the Pullman car "Eloise," Wagner car "Montpelier," and Wagner car "Messina" in the order named. All went well until 6.55, and the passengers in the sleepers were getting up and dressing expecting to reach Hamilton in a few minutes. The passengers in the ordinary coaches were looking out into the early Sunday morning, when without a moment's warning the crash came and launched twenty human beings into eternity. When the work of clearing up the wreck had been completed there were the remains of fourteen men and three women, with no trace of face or figure to be seen, the limbs gone on this, the head burned completely off on that. Not one with a semblance of humanity left. Except here and there a battered knife or key, a watch, a pair of suspenders, the sleeves of a coat, the top band of a pair of trousers, the remnant of a white shirt that had been torn from the body of its owner in his agony as the flames reached him.

It was an awful sight, and as the little bundles of charred flesh were laid out the men wiped their brows of the clamy sweat and again went to work. The keys in the clothing, the trinkets, and other indestructible means of identification were placed in a pail guarded by a constable, all together, for there were six or seven corpses so heaped together that it was impossible to find out which they belonged to.

Love's Latest Ally.

She will not wander in the wood,
Beneath its bending boughs,
The while he tells his tale of love
And pledges solemn vows.

She will not walk upon the shore
Where Ocean's tireless voice
Would drown the longed for words that I rate
Her secret soul rejoice.

Not e'en the twinkling stars above,
Nor yet the timid breeze,
Shall be made silent partners in Such precious things as these.

She'll hear no word till they are safe
Shut up within four walls,
And then she'll miss no syllable
That from the loved lips falls.

And while she treasures up each note
Within her heart she'll laugh
To think they're also registered
Upon her phonograph

And, should he e'er go back upon
His word, she'll bring a breach
Of promise suit, and reproduce—
In court—each silly speech.

ESTELLE'S INFATUATION:

A NOVEL.

"I am afraid not at all," he answered. "I am going back to London to-night. I want to find out, though," he added, suddenly, "who put that lying announcement of my death into the Times. Was it Mrs. Clanricarde or Mr. Harford?"

"No one knows who it was," said Lady Elizabeth. "But I am sure it was not Mr. Harford," she added, with emphasis. "He is not the kind of man to do such a thing as that."

"If it was the mother—" began Charlie. He did not complete his sentence, nor say what would follow that contingency. "I telegraphed the contradiction as soon as I saw it," he continued. "It was in the papers on the 26th of April."

"Yes," she answered.

"And there ought to have been a letter from me on the same day," he continued. "As soon as I was able, I wrote to her to tell her that I had been ill but was recovering. She should have got it on the 26th, for I kept note of time and dates."

"I do not suppose she was allowed to have that. And perhaps it was better as things were," said Lady Elizabeth.

"Not better," he answered, fiercely, "if it had prevented this hideous sacrilege. I am sure she would not have committed this crime if she had known that I was alive."

This was one of his thoughts. Another was that she had voluntarily sold herself, now for her mother's sake, and now, when he was especially bitter, for her own.

"She certainly believed you dead," said Lady Elizabeth. "I do not suppose she knows that you are alive now. Her husband would probably not tell her even if he knows, and I am sure Mrs. Clanricarde would not."

"She shall know, that I swear," said Charlie, excitedly.

Caleb touched his arm with a deprecating hand.

"Would it not be better to let her live in peace?" he asked, humbly. "It is done now, and cannot be undone. Should she not be left to bear what she has to bear, without more being added to it?"

"That is my affair, not yours," said Charlie, haughtily, and the poor omadhaun for a moment shrank back.

Then, emboldened by his loyal love, and to spare her whom he loved the faintest thrill of pain, he said, steadily: "Not all your affair, Mr. Osborne. There is a right and a wrong to everything, and all who value another have a certain voice in their matters. We have the right to speak both Lady Elizabeth and I—in a matter which touches the happiness of Mrs. Harford, for we are her friends too, as well as you, Mr. Osborne, though we have not your past; and we may without offence deprecate what would give her pain."

It was scarcely Caleb Stagg who spoke. It was the hunchback whose wings were free and whose hump had gone.

"I shall do as I think best," said Charlie, proudly, unable to meet his former rival on this higher ground. "Some day she shall know the infamous cheat that was practiced on her, and shall recognize all of them as the scoundrels they are. Father, mother, husband, friend—there was not one to warn her, not one to protect her!"

"Her friends did not know," said Lady Elizabeth. "I was not here."

"And it was evening post when I heard the news," said Caleb.

"Among you you have broken my heart and destroyed her life!" said Charlie, with a burst of passion, as he turned abruptly away, feeling truly the Ishmaelite among men—his hand against every man's, every man's hand against his.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE HOME-COMING.

The Harfords had been many months abroad. A strange instinct of danger kept Anthony out of England and loitering among Italian towns and Swiss chalets, where he had his beautiful young wife all to himself, and where no rocks were ahead which he did not see.

So they wandered over Europe, and Anthony did his best to warm this lovely statue into life, and reanimate the dead heart with a new love. It was all in vain.

Then the home journey was made, and they came back to England, and soon were re-established at Thrift.

He knew that he had not won Estelle. For all his love and care, his passionate desire to gain her heart, his eager devotion, his very fever of endeavor to win her love, he knew that he had not caught one single ray of her affection. She endured him because she was obliged to endure him—because she had no alternative, no place of refuge from him; because, too, she was of a sweet and gentle nature and she could not belie herself. But she only endured him on these lines of compulsion. Mrs. Clanricarde touched the sore by pretending to Anthony that things were other than what they were—that Estelle was loving and responsive when she was dead and inert.

The clear eyes of the clever diplomatist saw the whole situation at a glance. She added, as an afterthought, "At present she is a little languid, and indeed I should almost say, apathetic; but that will pass when her child is born. I have often seen young mothers expectant like this."

Then Anthony's stern bronzed face brightened.

"Yes," he said. "I suppose so. She is not, as you say, Mrs. Clanricarde, very lively just at present; but I suppose it will pass. Indeed, I am sure it will."

"So am I," said Estelle's mother, briskly, just as her daughter came slowly toward her, saying, "Will you not go to your room, mother?" as if she had said, "Two and two made four," with no more emphasis and no animation.

"Her mind is certainly touched!" said Mrs. Clanricarde to herself as she went upstairs. "What a dreadful thing, and in her state, too. Pray heaven she may never know that this detestable young man is alive! If she finds it out—well, there will be a catastrophe, that is very certain! And the blame will fall on me. It always does fall on the mother when a marriage turns ill!"

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE SPIDER AND THE FLY.

Hope's tales were false and flattering as usual; Estelle's new state of motherhood left her general condition unchanged. Naturally she loved the child; but she took no more interest than before in anything else.

As she grew stronger in health, her apathy seemed to increase. She cared nothing for her duties as house-mistress and local suzerain, and did not fulfil them. But any one could have opened that window in her breast through which her thoughts could be read, what a wild world would not be revealed!—what mad and feverish plans of escape with her child to some unknown and distant land, where she could live with him and her fatal memories, and forget the hideous slavery into which she had been sold! She had always that money so mysteriously sent to Charlie. Viewed by the light of her desires, it was a bank that would never fail, a river of gold that would never run dry. If only she could escape from England, and put Thrift, her husband, and her hated name forever behind her! What a volcano raged and burnt beneath her soft, still, frozen cover! what a very fierceness of hatred was masked by that gentle sweetness and that unresponsive apathy! And how well she kept the secret of heart, and how perfectly she played her part!

What Anthony suffered, felt or thought, no one knew, and perhaps he scarcely confessed to himself. With his heart's blood he watered the desert sands, which gave him back nothing in return. There was not even the humblest little flower of love; there was nothing but barren sand and lifeless rock.

Closely surrounded as she was by this investing love, Estelle had little or no freedom.

One day Anthony went to a rather distant town where he had to sit judging cases, whence he was sure not to return till night. Estelle had never been to see Mrs. Latimer or her servant—Charlie's Osborne's former nurse—since that day when she had gone with her father and mother and Anthony, then only her lover. To-day the opportunity seemed ready made to her hand. Accordingly she walked across the park and down Meads Lane, till she came to that row of houses standing on the outskirts of the town and at the extremity of the Thrift estate, in one of which Mrs. Latimer and Mary Crosby lived in their strict seclusion and by no means overcharged luxury Estelle knocked at the door, and Mary, after scanning her in the mirror set edgewise against the window, went back to the old lady, and said, in an excited whisper

"Glory! it's Mrs. Harford at last! Pull down the blind, Mrs. Latimer, muffle your head, and keep the room dark. We can do with her. It's the Lord's mercy she has come!"

"Well, Mary! How glad I am to see you again!" said Estelle, shaking hands impulsively with Charlie's old nurse.

"And I am glad to see you, Miss Estelle," said Mary answering back that friendly impulsiveness with its kind. "Come in, miss—lor, deary me!—Mrs. Harford, I should have said. But one forgets. Mrs. Latimer is in one of her better ways to-day. She'll likely be able to see you. She will if she can, that I know, for I have talked a great deal to her of old times, when I was Master Charlie's nurse you and he were children together. I know she will see you if she can. So come in, please."

"Thank you; yes, I will," said Estelle, who had quivered at the old familiar name.

She took Estelle into the state drawing room—the same room into which she had been taken on that former visit more than a year ago. And Mary saw how the young wife shuddered as the memory of that day came back on her mind.

"If I don't make something of this," thought Mary, feeling like one tabbing all round a cabinet to find the secret drawer its hidden key.

"I will go and see if Mrs. Latimer can see you, miss—Mrs. Harford," she then said, with a perceptible hesitation on the name. Why did she want to recall her unmarried state to Estelle? What ailed her, as the Scotch say, at her present condition as the wife of Mrs. Latimer's landlord? Had Estelle been in full possession of her natural mind she would have seen these ominous little threads, and would have feared them; but she was too preoccupied to see anything but her own inner self, or to be conscious of aught but her own sorrowful thoughts.

In a short time Mary came back. Yes; Mrs. Latimer was well enough to see her to-day. On which Estelle accompanied Charlie's old nurse into the back room, where, sitting in the dim obscurity of a darkened chamber, muffled up in shawls and buried in pillows, sat the tenacious old annuitant whose ugly trick of living was keeping the Clanricardes out of a tidy little income sorely needed, while adding a few unexpected plums to poor Charlie Osborne's not too luscious loaf.

"This is Miss Clanricarde, ma'am, as Mrs. Harford as is," shouted Mary to the old lady. "She is that deaf," she added in a natural voice to Estelle.

"Glad to see you, ma'am," said the old lady, coughing lugubriously.

"I am sorry you have such a cough," said tender-hearted Estelle.

"Hey? what does she say?" asked Mrs. Latimer of Mary.

Mary repeated the phrase in her boatswain's voice, and Mrs. Latimer was made to hear.

"It is my grave-cough, my dear," she answered. "Your father will soon come into my little bit of money. I'm not long for this world, I can tell you, and the Lord will soon have mercy on my old bones."

"I hope not so bad as that," said Estelle.

The old woman's keen black eyes twinkled.

"Lord love your dear innocent heart!" she said, and coughed more vigorously than before.

"Best not let her talk, Mrs. Harford," then interposed Mary. "Talking makes her cough so bad!"

"But I can't fail to say how good you always were," said Estelle.

"To poor dear Master Charlie?"

"Yes," said Estelle, with a quiver in her voice.

"Ah, but then I loved him! Who would not?" said Mary. "He was the bonniest little gentleman as ever wore shoe-leather. I never knew his equal!"

"Nor I," said Estelle, with the frankness of despair.

There was no reason why she should not carry this incense of fidelity to that dear grave, why she should not keep his memory like a perfume in her heart.

"That was a queer start, that word of his death, was it not, Miss Estelle—Mrs. Harford, I mean?" asked Mary.

Estelle opened her eyes. They were full of tears.

"Why?" she asked in her turn. "What was there queer in it?"

"Why, did you not know?" said Mary, in surprise. "It was all false news. He is not dead at all. The back-word came into the paper, let me see, the 26th of April, last year—yes, the 26th of April. And now this is August, a year gone, and we have heard no more about him."

Estelle started up from her place as if she had been struck. Her face was white and rigid; her eyes were dark and strained; her parted lips were as full of horror as a Greek tragic mask. She looked as if suddenly turned to stone, but with always the fiery heart of suffering within the marble body.

"The 26th of April—last year?" she said, slowly.

"Yes, ma'am," answered Mary. "I have it here."

She opened a drawer in the table and took out a Times newspaper.

"There," she said, pointing to the "agony column"—"there is Master Charlie's own words."

Overcome, beside herself, like one distraught, Estelle read the words, which she carried to her lips with a low cry of mingled joy and pain, then fell prone on the floor as if she had been shot through the heart.

"Now the road's clear," said Mary, as she lifted her up and dashed cold water in her face. "It is, as plain as daylight, and I was right. They've sold the poor young thing to this man here, and she loves Master Charlie as a wife shouldn't ought. There is a bad day in store for Mr. Harford and the rest of them; and I reckon I've got pepper enough for them now if they come roaring about us any more."

"My word, Mary, but you are bold!" said Mrs. Latimer, as she had so often said before. Her admiration of the younger woman's cleverness and audacity increased rather than diminished with each fresh manifestation.

"What I put my hand to I don't turn back from," said Mary, sententiously, as she still busied herself about Estelle.

At last the poor girl came out of her swoon and re-entered the thorny path of consciousness. She could not now, if even she would, deny the confession she had involuntarily made. Nature had forced her secret from her, and the torn veil could not be replaced. Mary knew her heart, and so far held her in the hollow of her hand. But she did not think of this in the light of danger to herself. She thought only of the woman's sympathy, so certain because of her own for Charlie. She would be pitiful to her—understanding how another should also love him, even though that other were now a wife and mother. And she would be some one to whom she, Estelle, could come and talk without fear or stint. Whenever there was a free day she would come over to Highstile Lane and talk to Mary Crosby of Charlie—Charlie, the child whom she had nursed—Charlie, the man whom Estelle still loved. But the black wickedness of those who should have been her best friends, the cruelty of those who should have cared for her and protected her! She saw it all, as clearly as she saw the words themselves. Her mother had inserted the lie of Charlie's death that the way might be free for Anthony. The marriage had been hastened on with such indecent hurry that the contradiction might not arrive meanwhile. It had come on the very day, and it had been kept from her. At the altar itself she would have turned back and refused to become Anthony's wife had she known that Charlie was still alive. Hoodwinked, betrayed, entrapped, what faith did she owe to any of them? What right had they to her life? None! From this moment she felt herself essentially free. The past had come before the present, and her very child had not the claim that Charlie Osborne had.

The wakening from those long months of mental lethargy and emotional death had come with a vengeance. Burning with fever, strong with the fictitious strength of mingled outrage and despair, like the armor in which her love had clothed itself, Estelle felt as if she could have braved the whole world for the sake of the one dear love of her life. All she wanted now was to see him, to hear his voice, to tell him how her heart had been broken—how her life had been ruined by the shameful lie which had been palmed off on her for truth—but how through it all she had kept her love and her faith and constancy intact. They had sold her body into worse than bondage, but they had not touched her soul, her love, her heart. All that she had been she still was, and the love that had grown with her growth and had lived through all opposition was still as pure and true as when they last met and parted. Ay! pure and true, for all that hated ring on her finger and that alien babe at her breast!

Full of these thoughts, she went back through the park to the house she had never adopted as her home. But, like all timid creatures, she knew that she must hide what she felt, if she could not feign what she did not feel. And when Anthony came home he found her as he had left her—silent, quiescent, unresponsive, monosyllabic—neither pleased with nor averse from—a mere sweet and patient living corpse, whose love he poured out his strong heart's blood in vain to win. But he noticed with the quick eyes of love that her hands burned as if with fever, that her usually pale face was flushed and hectic, and that her parched lips were dry. He noticed too, when he took her in his arms and drew her to his breast with that tenderness, that infinite yearning of the unloved seeking to gain what is denied, that she visibly shuddered and drew herself away as if she had been stung. He did not let her see what pain this mute repulse gave him. As gently, as tenderly as he had taken her did he now relinquish her; but over all his inner being came the deadly sickness which men call despair—that anguish of impotent fury which would revenge itself if it could, and which cannot find the object.

CHAPTER XIX.

LIKE A BIRD TO ITS NEST.

Charlie, still lingering at Kingshouse, took that strange pleasure so much indulged in by the sorrowful of adding to his distress of mind by every means in his power. Every one pitied him, so pale and hollow-eyed, so gaunt and sad as he was; and every one prophesied for him a speedy rest beneath the peaceful sods of the churchyard.

Even Mrs. Clanricarde found a compassionate corner in her heart for the enemy whom she had now disabled. She wished that she could have secured her own release from debt, and Estelle's sufficient establishment, by less painful methods than her daughter's life long misery and Charlie Osborne's threatened dissolution. It was very sad; but then people are so headstrong and unreasonable, and will not see things as they are, nor act rationally! What business had these two young people to fall in love as they had done? They knew the thing was impossible. It was their folly, not her falsehood, which had wrought all the mischief, and we must be responsible, each of us, for our own doings.

Nevertheless, she was sorry to see the poor boy look so ill, and wished that she could have comforted him. But Charlie would have none of her sympathy; and Mrs. Clanricarde, with a French shrug of her shoulders, left him to his fate and called him impayable.

One sultry summer's day a letter came to Charlie Osborne—an anonymous letter, in the well-known handwriting, but with a different post-mark. Hitherto all these letters had been posted in London; but this was stamped Thorbergh. It contained money and these words:

"Come to Thorbergh. You are badly wanted. Your old nurse, Mary Crosby, lives at 3, Highstile Lane, and can tell you some things you ought to know."

Thorbergh! the place where his faithless love had her home. What new delusion was this? What meshes were enclosing him? And who was his unknown friend who sent him these sporadic supplies? It could not be she, for they had come to him before her great wealth had come to her. It could not be Mary Crosby herself. How could a poor servant send him money far exceeding any possible wages or savings she might have? Yet the handwriting was the same.

The next day, as early as was practicable, Charlie found the house where Mrs. Latimer lived in such strict seclusion, and was welcomed by Mary with shrill exclamations of wonderment and delight.

He went into the cold, hard, primly set best drawing-room, and there began his cross-examination. He showed Mary the letter he had received, and asked her what she knew about it.

"Nay, what!" she said, in answer, "I know naught at all! If it were the last word I had to speak I'd say with my dying breath. I know naught about it anyway."

"But what have you to tell me?" he asked again. "Why should I be summoned here?"

"That caps me," said Mary. "That's just what gets over me, Master Charlie."

Charlie thought for an instant before speaking. His eyes were turned to the floor; Mary's were on his face.

"Do you remember Miss Clanricarde?" he then asked, with a certain reluctance. He did not like to bring her name into the vulgar light of a servant's quasi-confidence.

"Mrs. Harford as is?" she returned. "Yes, I know her well. Mr. Harford is the landlord of all this lot. He is Mrs. Latimer's landlord, and Mrs. Harford sometimes comes to see us."

Poor Charlie's face changed as eloquently as Estelle's when she had heard of his continued existence. He covered his eyes with his hand. The mystery deepened, but the glory that shone through its darkness blinded him. Could it have been she herself who had sent the letter? But no! the handwriting was familiar. It was connected with those sporadic supplies, and these were not connected with her. No. It was not Estelle who had summoned him, and not Mary Crosby. Who, in Heaven's name, could it be?

"Mrs. Harford was here only the other day," continued Mary, in an indifferent voice. "She had not heard of your being alive, Master Charlie, as I am that glad to see. She had not heard of it till I chanced to tell her."

"No!" said Charlie, with a shout. "And then?"

"Well, you see, sir, the shock was almost too much for her," continued Mary. "She is in poor health, poor young lady, and looks white and thin—as white and thin as yourself, Master Charlie. And when I showed her the paper, why, she just shrieked and fainted, and fell flat on the floor."

Charlie got up and walked to the window. His heart was beating wildly, his eyes were dim, his head was dizzy. She loved him, then—loved him now as much as ever; and her marriage had been, as he had always believed—forgetting the baser whisperings of his angry suspicions—a forced marriage founded on a lie. She was faithful to him still. Dear, sweet, loving, and beloved Estelle!—faithful, faithful for life and to death—as he to her!

And now what was to be done? He was here, and she was not an hour's walk apart; and yet were they not separated as completely as though impassable mountains and the unharvested sea lay between them? They were, in fact, farther apart than when he had been sick with fever in Yokohama, and she had been free and unfettered at Kingshouse.

But they must meet. He must see her, cost what it might. He owed nothing to the man who had robbed him of her, nothing to the society, the superstition, which sanctioned this sacrilege and called it sacred. He owed himself only to her, to clear himself from any possible charge of indifference or carelessness or wrong-doing anyhow. He owed himself only to her.

"Does Mrs. Harford often come here?" asked Charlie, when he came back to himself so far as to remember that he owed something to Crosby was not in his confidence.

"Not often, sir. Only when Mr. Harford is away," was the answer. "I fancy he keeps her pretty tight," she added as a compassionate coda or afterthought.

"Brute!" said Charlie, with a groan.

"A little that way, I think," said Mary, with a sigh.

Charlie clinched his hands. If he could but have used them as battering-rams to pound the life out of that scoundrel!

"I should like to see her again," said Charlie, after a pause.

"Why not call, Master Charlie," Mary asked, innocently. "I am certain sure she would be fain to see you. She is of the kind to love her own, and you are like her own—like her very brother, as one might say."

"I do not know Mr. Harford, and I would not care to call at his place," said Charlie, a little reluctantly.

"Perhaps I shall meet her," said Charlie, moving toward the door. "I should like to see."

"Yes, you'll be sure to meet her," returned Mary, cheerfully. "Mr. Harford drives her a good deal about the country. You'll be main sure to meet them."

"Confound and curse Mr. Harford!" cried Charlie, beside himself. "For God's sake, Mary, spare me his name!"

"All right, sir. I have no particular affection for him myself,' was her answer. "All the same, Miss Estelle is his wife, you see, Master Charlie, and a wife is bound to follow her husband's lead."

"I will wring his neck!" groaned Charlie.

Mary looked as she used in olden times when he was naughty and had to be spanked.

"Oh, fie! Master Charlie," she said, in just the old tone of reproof. "What has the poor gentleman done to you, I should like to know?"

"What no gentleman would have done—a cur like him deserves hanging for!" shouted Charlie. "He has taken the woman I love and who loves me—and he has taken her by a lie—and he knew it."

Mary's face took on its natural hardness curves and lines of the softest sympathy.

"I am sorry! oh, my, I am that sorry!" she said, her apron to her eyes, and her womanly sob quite audible. After a time she seemed to compose herself. "Master Charlie," she said, with the straightness of a sudden thought, "why do you not come here to stay, rather than to the hotel? There is plenty of room, and I could do for you fine. Why not send your luggage here? You could then stay as long as you liked in Thorbergh, and no one be a penny the worse or wiser. We live that quiet, no one sees or knows what passes here. You, and even more than you, could have the best bedroom and this parlor, and you'd be as safe as if locked up in a church. If you'd like it, Master Charlie, think of it. You'll find me as good as my word."

"God bless you, Mary! my good dear Mary!" was the poor fellow's reply, as impulsively he put his arm round her waist and kissed her as in his boyish days.

Some vague feeling that this offer might serve him in good stead filled his heart with hope and light. He did not know what he thought—he did not formulate nor arrange his feelings into words—but he felt that he had a biding-place if he wanted it. And perhaps he might.

With another burst of thanks to this servant of the tough old annuitant, he promised to bring his portmanteau that evening at dark—to bring it himself, no one knowing where he went; and then he left the house and took the road up Mead's Lane, with full directions from Mary where to find the park and grounds of Thrift.

More mad than sane, Charlie walked on with but one hope, one desire, one intention. He would see her again. The mystery of his summons ceased to interest him. He forgot Mary and all that life contained, save that one loadstar of his love—that glorious and beloved Estelle. He would see her again. He would hear from her own lips the story of her sorrow and their sin. He would hold her in his arms and clasp her to his heart. She was his. She was not this man's—this border-ruffian, this gambler, this horse-stealer, this rude rough miner with one hand on his revolver and the other on a secreted card.

Always in this turmoil of tempestuous sorrow and longing Charlie went through the leafy lane till he came to a narrow opening between two uprights which led into a park. He passed through and walked on, knowing well enough where he was. He went on and on, walking always more rapidly, till he came to the gate of the private gardens surrounding a stately mansion, with an upper terrace leading down by a double flight of steps into the lower grounds. On this upper terrace stood a woman, dressed for walking. She was alone. Charlie came up the drive till he was near enough to see the face and figure clearly. It was Estelle—looking far away over the gardens and the park to the distant beyond—there, where Charlie Osborne was somewhere to be found. She was too much absorbed in her own thoughts to see the man walking in the shadow of the trees toward the house. He came close under the terrace wall, and then he called her by her name. She heard him, and bent over the parapet above, as one who had expected him—as one who had been waiting for this moment.

"Estelle!" he said. "My darling! My beloved!"

With the old light, eager tread—the old suggestion of a bird running to its nest—she came down the steps and into the shadow of the wall, where, forgetting husband, child, her name of wife, her fair fame, and all the present save that she was his, she flung herself into her old lover's arms, and sobbed out her soul on his lips.

Abuse of the Brain.

It is well for us to know that the emotions cause more unhappiness and crime than any other function of the brain. It is its emotions that wear away the brain, and not intellectual work. Very few people suffer from intellectual work, and, if my memory serves me, I do not recollect ever having a mathematician for a patient. It is not intellectual work that causes nervous dyspepsia, but the emotions, such as anxiety, fear, sorrow and love.—Dr. Wm. A. Hammond.

New Trick of the Dressmaker's Trade.

One of the new tricks of the dressmaker's trade is to baste a sheet of wadding and a thin muslin interlining under the back breadths of Empire frocks, plait all three together and secure the lower edge of the lining and wadding to tapes sewed nine or ten inches below the waist. This makes the plaits look full and soft, and is not so obstinate as the bustle, which even in this stage of high civilization is capable of executing such fantastic tricks before high heaven as—but it is not necessary to continue the quotation. Angels are free from earthly troubles.

Mary Stuart's Alluring Eyes.

I was the other day looking at the various portraits of Mary Stuart, says a writer for Truth, London. Allowing that the colors have faded, and that she might have had a good complexion, it is clear, by the concurrent testimony of all the portraits, that she could not have been even passably good looking. Both her nose and her forehead are positively ugly. "How then," I asked an artistic friend of mine, "should she have been so successful a flirt?" "It was all by means of her eyes," he said. "But her eyes do not seem to have been exceptionally beautiful," I replied. "No," he said, "they evidently were not. I was alluding to the mode in which she used them." This is probably true, and it ought to lead the plainest of girls not to despair of her power to ensnare.

Royalty in Thick Boots.

In the Princess of Wales English women have an illustrious example of courage in facing bad weather. Her hardy northern upbringing was in her favor in accustoming her to open air exercise every day. Many a younger woman is seen driving to the "Row" in a close carriage, or in an open one with herself shrouded in furs, when the graceful, erect figure of the Princess in her Victoria is to be seen immediately afterwards, dressed merely as if for walking or visiting. Her daughters the Princess has brought up in her own natural, healthy habits. Very recently a Bond street bootmaker sent down to Sandringham for the young Princesses' walking boots and so substantial were they that they would have sent a daughter of George III. off in a faint. The ingenious manner in which an interlining made the boots damp-proof naturally added to their size, and the sturdy, broad sole, with heel rationally proportioned, gave promise of comfort in long walks, the maximum of exercise with the minimum of fatigue. The simple cloth jackets worn by the Princesses out of doors are often wondered at by young ladies of less exalted station who see no advantage of being a Princess unless the supply of new hats and handsome, fur-trimmed jackets is practically unlimited. A collar and cuffs of fur seem to content a Princess on a jacket for immediate wear when sealskin is too oppressive, while their contemporaries have boas, plastrons, cuffs and linings, and as much fur as can be heaped on their clothes when they go out walking or driving.

What Constitutes a Pretty Girl.

Form is most important. Coloring and a fine skin will not make a fine face strictly beautiful unless the features are regular and the head and face of perfect contour. The eyes should be set horizontally, having neither an upward nor downward inclination, not too far apart nor too close together. The nose should be placed at an even distance between the eyes, joining the forehead in a subtle curve, the lower portion straight, to emphasize the surrounding curves of the cheeks and lips. The "mouth like a Cupid's bow" is very beautiful.

The distance from the eyes to the tip of the nose, and from there to the chin, should each be one-fourth the length of the face; the mouth should be set at one-third the length of nose and chin; the chin should taper slightly to form an oval outline of face.

Nevertheless, with features which do not come up to the ideal, a girl will be considered "pretty" if she has a smooth, clear skin, bright, animated eyes and good teeth.

How Women Hamper Themselves.

"Why don't women have pockets?" growls the growler of the Chicago Journal. "They carry their purses in their hands and their handkerchiefs in their bodices, and they carry a little bag about as big as a pint cup on their arms, the exact use of which has never been defined. A man has plenty of pockets; he can carry keys. A woman is always wondering where she left or hid hers. There is nothing on earth to prevent any individual woman from enjoying innumerable pockets, loose sleeves, bifurcated underskirts, short hair, etc., and all the other modern feminine improvements."

The Latest in Bonnets.

London Truth of this week says: The Rose Fenwick is a collapsible or crush bonnet. It was invented by Miss Rose Fenwick, the daughter of an admiral, and is being now taken up by the Paris milliners. Play-goers who frequent the pit will have reason to bless the inventor if it proves to be the coming bonnet. It shuts up like a crush hat and when in its collapsed state looks like a fan or a fan shaped reticule. It can be made to serve as such hooked on to a girdle. When open it is like any other bonnet of the Fanchon form, but prettier. One of its virtues is that it does not require a big band box. Indeed, one might thrust it into a glove box. For matinee dances it would be ideal.

How Women Rest.

How differently men and women indulge themselves in what is called a resting spell. "I guess I'll sit down and mend these stockings and rest awhile," says the wife; but her husband throws himself upon the easy lounge, or sits back in his arm-chair, with hands at rest and feet placed horizontally upon another chair. The result is that his whole body gains full benefit of the half-hour he allows himself from work, and the wife only receives that indirect help which comes from change of occupation. A physician would tell her that taking even ten minutes' rest in a horizontal position, as a change from standing or sitting at work, would prove more beneficial to her than any of her makeshifts at resting. Busy women have a habit of keeping on their feet just as long as they can, in spite of backaches and warning pains. As they grow older they see the folly of permitting such drafts upon their strength, and learn to take things easier, let what will happen. They say, "I used to think I must do thus and so, but I've grown wiser and learned to slight things." The first years of housekeeping are truly the hardest, for untried and unfamiliar cares are almost daily thrust upon the mother and homemaker.

Gossip About the Sex.

Miss Nellie Cushman enjoys the reputation of being the only girl mining expert in the world. She is well-known throughout all the mining towns of Arizona.

Bessie Rockefeller, daughter of the Standard Oil magnate, received a wedding gift of $1,000,000 from her father when she was married to Charles A. Strong, son of the Rev. A. H. Strong, D. D., President of the Rochester Theological Seminary.

An English paper recently published the following advertisement: "Notice.—To ladies of position: Will any lady of good social position receive another in her house for a week during next May, and present her at the last of May drawing-rooms. Satisfactory terms to be arranged and good references given. Strict confidence will be observed."

Women are so scarce in Blaine county, Neb., that the ministers and justices of the peace vie with one another for the honor of performing wedding ceremonies. The story goes that a well known bachelor farmer in an unguarded moment let it become known that he was daily expecting the arrival of his bride-to-be from the East. He was sorry for the slip when he learned that the whole judicial and clerical force in the county had camped on his farm awaitin her arrival.

It is perfectly true, says Figaro, that the Prince and Princess of Wales, with three of their daughters, dined with the officers of the First Life Guards at Knightsbridge on Sunday. Whether it is wise of their royal highnesses to attend big dinner parties on Sunday is a matter for their own consideration. But the incident has, of course, excited remark and some surprise. There is no reason why the Prince and Princess, like any other person, should not accept the hospitality of their friends on Sunday, but the objection is Knightsbridge barracks.

Latest Fashion Notes.

In real flowers tulips and lilies of the valley are to the fore, decorating festive boards and forming bouquets and button holes. Choicest of all is the fragrant exotic white lilac, which is in great request now blended with fern, or alone in its beauty.

That which gives great variety to modern toilets is that an upper skirt generally falls over the under flounced one, in separate panels, either loose or slightly draped, fastened here and there with a bow or ornament of passementerie. Bodices are also made in very various styles; some are peaked and some are round-waisted; some are plain and others finely plaited or fully gathered. Wide sashes are draped round the waist and tied at the back or side.

Although many of the new silk and wool fabrics show quaint and rich devices, with silver, steel, copper and gold appearing in some of the Persian and old Roman patterns, and although an endless variety of stylish plaids and stripes appear, still the solid colored materials in exquisitely rich dyes and weaving, either finished with handsome Persian borderings, or made up with velvet or faille, have taken the precedence in the making of the really elegant and ladylike gowns worn this winter.

This fashion of silk petticoats allows of making use of many a demodes dress. It is easy to make them up one's self, or any lady's maid can arrange one; one has but to choose from a silk dress or tunic of a former season those widths which are still good enough, and cut them from a good pattern into an underskirt. By way of trimming, a lace flounce, or a silk one divided by strips of lace insertion, a plain band of velvet or handsome galloon, in fact anything and everything the fancy may dictate.

All our fashions are copied for children, and very prettily copied, it must be confessed. Behold them with the cape a la Payeanne; are they not charming, with the full loose mantle, puckered up all round the neck? A very dainty model of capucine cloth, lined with almond-green surah; a pinked-out ruche of cloth goes round the edge, and the cape is fastened at the throat with a bow of ribbon; this, with the enormous Greenaway capote in which the dainty face half disappears, forms a unique and most becoming walking attire for little ones from 2 to 4 years old.

White underskirts are by no means gone out of fashion. There are exquisite jupons of muslin or nainsook, all betrimmed with lace put on in flounces and insertions. But silk underskirts are generally preferred by Parisian ladies as both more elegant and more practical. The most useful of all is that of black silk; but for spring or summer wear that of glace silk of two shades of color, chiefly red and blue, is the prettiest to wear under light fabrics. The simpler ones are trimmed with pinked-out flounces; the more elaborate and dressy are now frequently ornamented with a deep fluting of wide open-work net, through which five or seven rows of narrow satin ribbon are run at regular distances.

SAID Mr. Justice Stephen, of England, alluding to the case of a defendant who sought to escape liability for certain expenditures by throwing the blame of ordering it upon his wife: "That is a very old excuse. I often felt that Adam—I mean—that is—well! I have always wished to hear Eve's account of that transaction."

A FRESHLY executed painting may have its colors presented in the mellow tones of the old masters by first covering the back with a coating of fuller's earth, which absorbs all remaining oil, and then, on removing it, covering the back with a coat of linseed oil, which the colors presently imbibe. This is the alleged discovery of a celebrated French painter.

P. T. BARNUM published in Bethel, Ct., half a century ago, the Herald of Freedom. His unqualified utterances resulted in his incarceration in the Danbury jail. A short time ago Editor Wildman, of that city, who was formerly a typesetter on the old Herald, sent the showman a cane made from a portion of the now demolished building where Mr. Barnum was "imprisoned half a century ago for publishing the truth." Mr. Barnum was so pleased with the memento that he has returned the compliment of the veteran editor with a valuable gift.

A PRIVATE residence in Providence, R.I. was much troubled by unpleasant odors and several of the inmates were sick with what the doctor said was sewer-gas fever. A plumber was called in and proceeded to apply the peppermint test from the roof. In three minutes the entire house was filled with the odor, and further investigation disclosed the fact that in order to keep the cold air duct dry an untrapped drain led from it at a point under the furnace directly to the main sewer. Through this the sewer gas was drawn into the furnace, and having been nicely warmed was distributed through the house for the comfort of the occupants.

THE oldest pieces of wrought iron now known are probably the sickle blade found by Belzoni under the base of a sphinx in Karnac, near Thebes; the blade found by Colonel Vyze, imbedded in the masonry of the great pyramid; the portion of a cross-cut saw exhumed at Nimrod by Mr. Layard—all of which are now in the British Museum. A wrought bar of Damascus steel was presented by King Porus to Alexander the Great, and the razor steel of China for many centuries has surpassed all European steel in temper and durability of edge. The Hindoos appear to have made wrought iron directly from the ore, without passing it through a furnace, from time immemorial, and elaborately wrought masses of iron are still found in India, which date from the early centuries of the Christian era.

THE Manufacturer and Builder gives some interesting information about the manufacture of toothpicks in a Michigan factory. The wood of the canoe birch is used exclusively. The logs are sawed into pieces 28 inches long, which are thoroughly steamed and then cut into veneer. The veneer is cut into long ribbons three inches in width, and these ribbons, eight or ten of them at a time, are run through the toothpick machinery, coming out at the other end, the perfect pieces falling into one basket, the broken pieces and the refuse falling into another. The picks are packed into boxes, 1,500 in a box, by girls, mostly comely-looking young squaws, and are then packed into cases and finally into big boxes, ready for shipment to all parts of the world. About seven and a half million toothpicks are turned out each working day by this one establishment.

BUFFALO Courier: "It is curious," said an aged member of one of the prominent churches in town, "to note the changes in sittings made by the congregation. I have been a member of this church for years, and the movement of the congregation is as slow and gradual and sure as that of a glacier. The single young folks, as a rule, sit in the back part of the church. There you will see the lonely young men and the timorous maidens. In the course of a few years these young people marry and move up towards the middle of the church, and as families increase in numbers they take the prominent seats and occupy them for years and years. Then comes old age, when the eye is dimmed and the ear is dulled, and these hoary people move up into the front pews, where they may be seen any Sunday, white-haired and venerable, with their hands behind their ears listening to the sermon."

A COTTON fabric which has been patented in England is thus described: "It has the appearance and soft feel of chamois leather, and it is guaranteed will not lose its special qualities when washed. In making the cloth cotton yarns form the warps, these being dyed a fast color, a chrome yellow tint being preferable; they are sized and dressed in the usual manner. The weft is spun soft and is used in the undyed state. The fabric is woven from these yarns, and is then pressed several times through cylinder teasing or raising machines, whereby the surface is broken and a good ground nap is produced on one or both sides thereof. The fabric is then 'soap' finished, to impart to it the desired appearance and soft, cold feel of chamois leather. It is applicable for either wet or dry cleaning purposes and also as a polishing cloth, and especially suitable for underclothing and for linings of the same, and for general use as a substitute for the chamois leather now used for these and for analogous purposes. Being, moreover, of a woven texture and absorbent, it is more healthy for use in garments than chamois leather, and does not require to be perforated. Unlike leather also, which gets stiff after washing, this improved material so produced is capable of being repeatedly washed without stiffening, and is found to retain its softness perpetually."

PROF. HUXLEY denies the impeachment quoted by the Pall Mall Gazette from a Chicago paper, that he is disposed to judge spiritualism more or less favorably. He has been present at various spiritualistic manifestations, and his "deliberate judgment" is that "the mediums were each and all utter impostors, and with one exception not even clever at their shameful trade." He once sat at a table which was to be moved by spirits. There was a tall lamp on the table, and he kept his gaze fixed on a particular pattern of the wall paper, just covered by the globe. Suddenly the medium said, "There, did you see the table move?" and there was a general cry of wondering assent. But the sceptical Professor had not seen the shadow on the wall move. He pointed out this little difficulty, and by dint of persistence got an admission even from the medium that there was some doubt about the matter. As to rapping, he experimented himself with such success that he could produce a series of startling raps with the second toe of each foot. He simply had to bend the toe, and then suddenly straighten it. A celebrated lady medium once informed a friend of the Professor's at a country house that the spirit of his sister Mary wanted to communicate with him. A very touching conversation followed. Afterwards the medium privately asked: "Did you ever have a sister Mary?' He—"No!' She—"I thought not."

THE PAPER AGE.

A Time is Coming When Paper Will Run the Earth.

The world has seen its iron age, its stone age, its golden age and its brazen age, says the Paper World. This is the age of paper. We are making so many things of paper that it will soon be true that without paper there is nothing made that is made. We live in paper houses, wear paper clothing and sit on paper cushions in paper cars, rolling on paper wheels. We do a paper business over paper counters, buying paper goods, paying for them in paper money or charging them up in paper books, and deal in paper stocks on paper margins. We row races in paper boats for paper prizes. We go to paper theatres where paper actors play to paper audiences. We elect paper men with paper votes on a paper issue to represent a paper constituency in a paper Congress, and make paper laws. As the age develops, the coming man will become more deeply enmeshed in the paper net. He will awake in the morning and creep from under the paper clothing on his paper bed, and put on his paper dressing gown and paper slippers. He will walk over paper carpets down paper stairs, and, seating himself in a paper chair, will read the paper news in the morning paper. A paper bell will call him to his breakfast, cooked in a paper oven, served on paper dishes, laid on a paper cloth on a paper table. He will wipe his lips on a paper napkin, and, having put on his paper shoes, paper hat and paper coat and taken his paper cane, he will walk on a paper pavement or ride in a paper carriage to his paper office. He will go to Europe on paper steamships and navigate the air in paper balloons.

French Dishes.

Snails cooked in their shells form a dish which, however enjoyable it may be to the French gourmand, an American cannot relish. At a fashionable dinner the writer got along very well until a plate of a half-dozen was set before him, but he put a bold face on the matter and tried to follow the example of the rest. The thing was coated with a nasty-looking dark greenish slime, and looked forbidding. He transferred it hastily to his mouth. The first thing perceived was an awful reptile flavor, like the scent in the neighborhood of the boa constrictor cage in a menagerie. He tried to bite the morsel, but it was like rubber, and tough as an old boot. It began to grow big in his mouth, until it seemed to attain the size of an elephant. He felt himself turning pale. At last he gave a hasty gulp and swallowed the whole thing. Talk of Thackeray's American oyster experience being like swallowing a raw baby; that French snail went down like a raw alligator; his French friend by his side observed his embarrassment with an amused smile, and, remarking that he evidently did not like snails, kindly relieved him of the rest of them and transferred them to his own plate. The artichoke, a vegetable much liked in France, was also the writer's despair. Everybody was eating them in the restaurants, and so he thought he would call for one. He was advised to try a half one to begin on. So a half artichoke was brought, boiled, with vinegar and oil. It was like a pine cone sliced in two. The scales were like those of the pine cone, too, and there were more of them than skins to an onion. These scales were pulled off, one by one, and just the lower end, which was tender, bitten off, after dipping it in oil and vinegar. It tasted like a soaked out chestnut, with a strong flavor of burdock. But the strong point of the artichoke is the time taken to eat it. The writer consumed about half an hour and only the outer layer was disposed of. To eat a whole artichoke would take a small eternity. He came to the conclusion, finally, that American cookery, on the whole, was more nourishing than French. —Waverly Magazine.

John's Philosophy of Wedlock.

A rumor that a Chinese laundryman in the Bowery had murdered his Irish-American wife attracted a lot of reporters to the subterranean wash-rooms not long ago. They ascertained that John had merely blacked his wife's eye. The pair were ironing at opposite tables and seemed happy. The woman declared that she was satisfied to take a licking from her husband occasionally, and that nobody else had any right to interfere. A philanthropic scribbler remarked to the Chinaman, "John, don't you know it is wrong to lick your wife?"

The washerman stopped ironing a moment, gazed at the reporter, and said: "You got wife?"

"Yes."

"You no lickee her?"

"Certainly not."

"Well," said the Chinaman, in a tone of profound conviction, "you no lickee her, she lickee you."—New York World.

He Appreciated Them.

Chathard—How beautifully the roses bloom on Miss Sigourney's cheeks!

Saysit Anyhowe—Yes, I always did admire hand-painted flowers.

A Great Excuse.

Teacher—What made you make a face at me?

Little Johnnie—Please, ma'am, I didn't think you were looking.

Johnnie (with a Sunday school book)—Say, papa, what is a martyr? Papa (cautiously)—Don't ask such questions now, my child. Wait until you are old enough to be married.

A small leasehold property in Worcestershire, England, is announced for sale by auction "for the residue of term of 2,000 years created in the year 1600."

"The Child and the Tramp."

The following lines from Mrs. Platt's book of poems, "The Witch of Glass" (Stock), are supposed to be addressed by a well-to-do child, surfeited with civilization, to a tramp outside the window:

It's not so nice here as it looks,
With china that keeps breaking so,
And five of Mr. Tennyson's books
Too fine to look in—is it, though?

If you just had to sit here (Well!)
In satin chairs too blue to touch,
And look at flowers too sweet to smell,
In vases—would you like it much?

If you see any flowers, they grow,
And you can find them in the sun.
These are the ones we buy, you know,
In winter-time—when there are none!

Then you can sit on rocks, you see,
And walk about in water, too—
Because you have no shoes! Dear me!
How many things they let you do!

Then you can sleep out in the shade
All day, I guess, and all night too,
Because—you know, you're not afraid
Of other fellows just like you!

You have no house like this, you know,
(Where mamma's cross, and ladies call)—
You have the world to live in, though,
And that's the prettiest place of all!

A Little Poet.

Out in the garden wee Elsie
Was gathering flowers for me.
"O, mamma," she cried, "hurry, hurry,
Here's something I want you to see."

I went to the window. Before her
A velvet-winged butterfly flew,
And the pansies themselves were not brighter
Than the beautiful creature in hue.

"O, isn't it pretty?" cried Elsie,
With eager and wondering eyes,
As she watched it soar lazily onward
Against the soft blue of the skies.

"I know what it is—don't you, mamma?"
O! the wisdom of these little things
When the soul of a poet is in them,
"It's a pansy—a pansy with wings."

A Tragedy of the Pinks.

My lady comes tripping lightly
Adown the bordered walks,
Swinging her garden scissors
(We tremble on our stalks),
Saying, "What shall I wear to night?
Here's a rose,
There are pinks,
Lilies, too!"—
She stops and thinks
Were ever eyes so clear and bright?

"What shall I wear that he loves best?"
And she softly smiles and sings
"Here are roses, and lilies, too,
And the pink with its perfumed wings.
He loves the pinks"—She leans and lingers
Then, clip! clip!
Ah, such gems!
And over our
Gray-green stem
She clasps her supple finger.

She places it on her warm white breast—
We forgive her cruel clipping
Alas! a rude step hasteneth
To steal the love we are sipping.
To wear the flowers he loveth best
He comes
And stands.
Then takes
Her hand—
The curtain falls—you know the rest.

He clasped her to his strong young breast,
She no more stops and thinks.
Two hearts are beating tenderly—
But where are the perfumed pinks?

An Obstinate Girl.

She's an artist and she paints
Like Titian
Though she won't consider saints
Her mission,
She could paint a holy soul
And would make the air color
Elysian.

But she thinks she can play
A guitar,
Or practicing make her way
As a star,
So of course she will remain
Making all my labors vain,
For she's as obstinate as Cain—
Most girls are.

REV. JOSEPH COOK.

Bill Nye Expresses His Opinion of the Great Boston Logician.

(Bill Nye in the New York World.)

Strolling about over the Union as I have for the past four months, I have had the pleasure of seeing and communicating with a number of men, all prominent in some line, and thinking that their personal appearance, as it struck me, might be of interest to the reader, I have reluctantly consented to write some impressions of a few under the general title of "Eminent Men whom I Have Saw.'

Joseph Cook, as the greatest man we have on the face of the earth to-day, according to calculations made by himself, would naturally come first. He is a grand man, engaged in thinking thoughts all the time, of which he is the theme. He occasionally takes a day off, during which he curses the newspapers in an earnest way, and then he goes back to hover over his porcelain nest-egg of thought.

Joseph Cook might have a good deal of fun if he would just oversee the universe daytimes and let some one else do it at night, but the slightest irregularity in the habits of a planet will bring Joe out of bed in an instant. He worries all the time for fear that a new-laid planet will wander away into the brush and get lost.

He dreads to die, not so much on his own account, but because he wants to be spared to those who are so poorly prepared to get along without him.

When he is colicky and fretful it is not that he cares a cent about it personally, but because he is all the time afraid to die and leave the universe in the hands of the Creator. He has been accustomed for so long to go around with a long-nosed oil-can searching for a hot journal in the solar system that he actually believes himself to be largely responsible for atmospheric conditions and astronomical phenomena.

Three Thoughts on Widows.

A widow is a being who appeals to the tenderest sympathies of humanity.

Bereft of her husband and natural protector the widow turns trustfully to the outside world for pity and moral support, and seldom fails to secure both.

In the breast of mankind is an ingrained feeling that a widow is a proper object of solicitude.—Indianapolis Journal.

We would like to add something to the foregoing beautiful tribute to the widow, but having once known her we are to full for utterance.

In Luck More Ways Than One.

Insurance Officer—I understand that Mr. Richman hasn't a cent of insurance on his life. Why don't you go for him?

Agent—Won't do. He was born lucky, and makes money out of everything he touches. If we should insure Richman to-day, ten chances to one he'd die to-morrow.

Gall.

We received last week a map of Manitoba, together with reprint copy of an advertisement which the publisher wished us to give in exchange for his map. It is overflowing with advertisements, and retails at 25 cents. As our charge for the advertisement would be $1.40, or $1.15 more than the maps cost, we decline to make the exchange. If the publisher will forward a one-cent stamp to pay postage his map will be returned.

Runaway

Friend W H. Elder, of Proton Station, visited Flesherton on Monday. While returning in the evening he met with a serious accident. Stopping at Mr. Mitchell's gate, near the village, to allow Mrs. Mitchell to alight, the horse became scared and ran away. The buggy was almost destroyed, and the animal was not recovered until the following day, when it was found in a farmer's stable on the east back line, it having been noticed and taken in.

Who is "Oben."

As a great deal of speculation is rife in in the vicinity of Priceville as to the identity of our Balsam Valley correspondent, and innocent personages are being blamed, we will state, at Mr. W. J. Blakeston's request, that that gentleman has never written a line of said correspondence. Guessers are "away off the track," and it is almost useless for them to exercise their brains in the attempt to ferret him out. Don't scare him off by too close questioning.

Trees and Shrubs.

This is the season for the planting of shrubs and trees. Flesherton is a picturesque village even now, but it could be made still more so if the inhabitants would spend a little more care upon the decoration of their lawns and boulevards. There is nothing known which will enhance the artistic beauty of a town like a judicious display of shrubs, flowers and shade trees. There cannot be too much care taken in this line, and it will always pay. A peoples' standard may be judged by the art displayed in their homes.

Dogs.

There are too many dogs of a sportive character in this neighborhood. During the past week they have been on the war path to a considerable extent. Mr. J. Adams came to the village one day last week and borrowed a gun. He is going on the war path, too, and intends to make dog meat plentiful around his premises if they don't quit fooling with his live stock. Mr. Cook, at the station, had one sheep killed and another badly worried. In all probability the crows will soon hold a grand jubilee on fat dog if the dogs' owners don't keep them strictly at home.

Special Announcement.

We have made arrangements with Dr. B. J. Kendal Co., publishers of "A Treatise of the Horse and his Diseases" which will enable all our subscribers to obtain a copy of the valuable work free by sending their address (enclosing a two-cent stamp for mailing same) to Dr. B.J. Kendall Co., Enosburgh Falls, Vt. This book is now recognized as standard authority upon all diseases of the horse, as its phenomenal sale attests, over four million copies have been sold in the past ten years, a sale never before reached by any publication in the same period of time. We feel confident that our patrons will appreciate the work, and be glad to avail themselves of this opportunity of obtaining a valuable book.

It is necessary that you mention this paper in sending for the "Treatise." This offer will remain open for only a short time.

Personal.

Dr. Hawk, of Berlin, has been visiting with his brothers here during the past week. The Dr. is giving up a most lucrative practice in Berlin with the intention of removing to Washington Territory, where he expects to gain something still better. May success attend his efforts.

Anniversary Sermon.

Rev. Mr. Emes preached the R. T. of T. anniversary sermon on Sunday afternoon last to a large congregation from Acts 24 and 25: "And as he reasoned of of rightousness temperance and judgement to come, Felix trembled, and answered, go thy way for this time." The sermon was an exceedingly good one. Mr. Emes is a close reasoner and an interesting talker. Some of his aphorisms remind one forcibly of Sam Jones, although clothed in more chaste language. For instance, "you cannot get to heaven with your two feet standing on the Bible and mouth at the bung hole of a beer barrel." Speaking of a certain class of individuals he remarked that it was as difficult to get money out of them for moral purposes as to draw milk from a gate post or blood from a turnip. "Don't make a mirror out of the bottom of a beer glass," etc. The Royals turned out "en bloc" and marched to the church. The sermon was listened to with wrapt attention and created a most favorable impression, being quite worthy of reproduction; but a curtailed report could not do it justice. We think we can conscientiously congratulate the Presbyterians upon the securing of Mr. Emes for this charge

They Paid for Their Taffy.

A very interesting affair took place in the neighborhood of Tyrone some time ago, which turns out to be at the expense of our taffy lovers or lusters as they might be called. Mr. John Sanders had one day boiled down a large quantity of sap into such a size that it was (as may be seen by the nature of the affair,) lighter than a mill stone. And a few of the boys thought this a grand opportunity to have a good feed, and as they were afraid of being caught if they would manufacture taffy in the bush, went and asked Mr. Amos Doupe for the privilege of making it in his house, being answered in the affirmative, off they started to accomplish their part of the theft But Mr. S. was too sharp for them, he watched the whole affair and followed them up to Mr Doupe's door where they engaged in a merry old game of euchre, while the hostess made ready the repast. They had their fun that night, but their tune was changed the next day, when they were very glad to settle with Mr. S. for the small sum of five dollars.

CORRESPONDENCE.

School Matters.

To The Editor of The Advance.

SIR—Your "Flesherton Station" correspondent's communication contains an animus and statements unsolicitated and erroneous, and which compels me to correct them if possible. I take it that he fails to comprehend his subject, and therefore falls into divers mistatements—unintentionally it is hoped. As he says "the school system is intended to give a good common education to every child," but that by no means implies that every child is equally accomodated to procure it. A variety of distances to school houses always has and always will exist. With due regard to the law in the matter, and ordinary insight into the ability of the ratepayer, I quite agree with your correspondent. But he takes umbrage at the mention of the Station school as if something erroneous had been mentioned; and it provokes me to state the facts in the case: Sec. 10, cap. 49, 48 vic., says: "No section shall be formed which contains less than fifty actual resident children, between the ages of five and twenty years old, unless the area contains more than four square miles." How stood this matter in 1886, when this section was formed? The legal census gave for that year 21 of such children, in 1887 24 children and in 1888 it gave 21. Recollect, the act asks for actual residents. How then were 50 such children obtained? Taking the record of the three years, one is led to blush at the effrontry of the person who would state that the section ever contained the number the law asked for, minus imported and transient stock. It is true, a committee of the county council, upon the evidence produced, gave them the school, erroneous as the evidence was. But there was no desire to oppose their request; for peace sake, the decision of the committee was suffered to show without appeal, and the Flesherton people, against whom a few only at the Station exhibit such perpetuous jealousy, have treated the whole question with proper deference, so far as equity and good will demand.

This gentleman says further that "Flesherton Station school is a success, and rejoices the heart of the people interested in it." If so, how is it that this same person put his signature to two petitions recently, one asking for his section enlarged territory, and the other asking a reconsideration of the action of the council, which was in effect to compel a few farmers, who refuse to unite with the Station school, to pay the cost of an appeal to the county, upon the ground of the section's inability to do so! What a specimen of hollowness and insincerity! Personally, I would like to see its school enlarged and prosperous. But it was because I knew the discontent, even to execrations, and excessive taxation, that it was referred to, as a warning to the people to avoid a repetition elsewhere in the township.

As to his fling at the councillors, they can take care of themselves, and can point with pride to their unopposed election in January last as a sufficient vindication against such writers. They are too shrewd to be hoodwinked into positions contrary to law and reason, and for which they are appreciated. If the suggestions of this writer were carried out, on school and other matters, municipal bankruptcy would be the result within five years. Regarding the Tyrone school, the scheme still seems impracticable, for providing the two sections with the compensations added, were all equally divided, it would create, as stated in my last letter, three weak schools, and an incumbrance on the people for all time to come. But I dare say the councillors will be wise enough to see it and act accordingly.

TYRONE.

To the Editor of The Advance.

DEAR SIR—Would you kindly allow me space in your very popular publication to reply to the Kimberley Glee Club item of last week. The writer accuses me of making some very "gross errors and many glaring misrepresentations" as he is pleased to term it and then undertakes to show them up. In the first place he as much as says Eugenia had no choir at that time. Eugenia local talent and regular choir, with one exception, furnished the music for a tea-meeting about a month previous to the Orange soiree, but owing to the sickness of the organist they could not very well get up the music for the soiree, and all the regular members of the choir were still in the village and practiced once a week. The Kimberley writer has made some very base fabrications. Eugenia had a choir of its own at that time and let "One Concerned" deny it if he dare. He won't if he has any regard for truth. Again he says when they received the invitation they accepted it under the conditions that they were to receive free tickets. There again he is wrong. I have the written acceptance before me, and it says not one word with regard to free tickets, still, owing to the generosity of the Orangemen, that part of the programme was politely carried out. He says also that they were told the organist would expect pay. The Orangemen have vainly endeavored to find out when or who they told. They certainly did not ask pay in the written acceptance, neither did they tell a member of the lodge so far as I am aware of, and I have consulted every active member and after all enquiries I have ascertained that a member of the club requested a friend, not a member of the lodge, to ask the treasurer on his behalf for a specified amount for the organist. This the friend declined to do, and for fear the lodge might think he was somewhat concerned, as no doubt he was, he took his dissatisfaction home, nursed it as preachers tell us we should nurse our good dispositions, then had it published in The Advance. Now if there was an agreement for pay as he says, why did he want a friend to ask pay for him from the lodge? The truth is clear there was no agreement to that effect. The second clause was, as he said, ruled out. No one said anything to the contrary. Now if the Kimberley writer would just think the matter over impartially, he will see I have not made so many "gross errors and misrepresentations" after all, as I have proved his contraciction to my statements of two weeks previous false, and on the other hand he has made some gross exaggerations.

Balsam Valley Items.

From our own Correspondent.

Plowing and sowing and everything connected with spring work has commenced in real earnest.

Mr. D. and A. Ferguson are seen to wend their way bright and early in the mornings from their private habitations to Mr. H. Lamont's farm, which they are putting in this spring on shares and farmer John, another of our industrious young farmers, is seen to leisurely walk up and down the field behind his red painted cultivator with an expression of countenance indicative of perfect satisfaction with the implement he uses. Sid and Sandy and Joe are also making rapid progress, and Pat last, but not least, with his usual forethought is preparing for harvest, as he has about closed a bargain with Mr. Marshall of Priceville for a new reaper. It would take up too much space to tell you all about our prosperous farming community. Suffice it to say they are all well and doing well, and as each one wends his way home it reminds me of the words of the poet: "The ploughman homeward plods his weary way."

Mr. Adam Watson has been running his saw mill for some time past, and the large piles of logs on the west side of the mill are fast decreasing. Mr. Watson is a man of push and energy, and we think he will do well as a miller in this neighborhood.

Mr. L. Frook, of this vicinity, took advantage of the slack time just before seeding to go on a visit to Brant. While there he purchased a fine thoroughbred bull, Durham breed, for which he paid the sum of $90. Mr. Frook is giving the farmers in this neighborhood an excellent opportunity of improving their stock which we hope they will avail themselves of. It is not solely for the purpose of obliging his neighbors that he has gone to the trouble and expense of getting up this animal, but he has seen as even a poor judge might that the stock around here stood greatly in need of improvement, and more than that, he found out that it pays.

One of our residents returned home from Priceville last fair day with a couple of red marks on his face. Upon enquiring into the matter we found out he was engaged in a pugilistic contest with one of the buttes and suddenly became possessed of a very unnatural desire for blood; consequently the first opportunity availing itself he took advantage of it in order to appease his appetite by grabbing a portion of his opponents face between his teeth and squeezing on it until he brought blood, or rather until he was forced to let go by others interfering. We understand that there is going to be law over it yet, as big Dan, constable of Priceville, was around serving summonses to those concerned. The next time I write I hope to give you an account of the case. They threaten to give Oben a thorough tanning, if ever they get hold of him, but he is a fine runner, and any wounds he will get will be on the back sure. His legs have always proven his best friends, and in an emergency like that, (especially if he thinks he is in danger of being bit) you bet he will use them to the best of his ability.

Mr. James Alcorn is the owner of a fine draught stallion which he brought from the county of Peel. It is a fine animal, two years old, and weighs 1500 lbs.

Mr. D. Ferguson was around with his blood horse, as we anticipated, Mr. C. Lamont and J. T. Nelson are also on the route, all fine animals of their class.

Mr. A. McLean is working at J. T. Wilson's.

Mr. David McIntyre is helping J. Burke to put in his crop, and Mr. F. McPhail is hired with Pat Burke.

Mr. Norman McDougal is engaged with Hector McDonal framing, they are at present framing Neil McDonal's barn.

Priceville Items.

From our own Correspondent.

The farmers are rarely seen about town now, they seem to be throwing in their seed grain very fast. A large portion of the land is in a fine condition for working, being drier than usual this year. The ladies come into town and do the shopping (especially the young ladies.) Well, we might just note that all our merchants are bachelors, with one exception.

We have a new tailor in town, in the person of Mr. Ross, late of Claude, Ont. We will probably see his "ad" in The Advance before many days.

Well, "Oben" I am sure that your admiring friends in the "Valley" will remember your distinction between "goose" and "gull" or if they see a fowl or fowls of that description without "spectacles" then, "of course they cannot be gulls." We can hardly credit such a statement, but we suppose it must be so, coming from such an authority as "Oben."

We are seriously thinking of spending a summer in "Balsam Valley" in order to attend that great seat of learning, "Hillside Academy," in hopes thereby to improve our English, so that we may avoid using those slang phrases that seem so unintelligable to the cultured, Balsamic mind. And last but not least, your brilliant, periodical, musical entertainment with little children on the platforms, dancing, keeping time to the organ, violin, picolo, sacbut, psaltry, harp, dulcimer and all kinds of music! Oh, it must be very elevating! But we must hush now or some body will say that we are as "longwinded" as "Oben."

The above correspondence arrived after the form had been made up last week. ED. ADVANCE.

WHISKEY DID IT.

A Dissolute Son Murders His Father and Himself.

A Springfield, Mass., despatch says: West Farms was the scene of a horrible double tragedy yesterday morning. Joseph King, a wealthy, well-known citizen, 78 years of age, was shot and killed by Edgar King, his eldest son, and the house was fired and burned. Sometime afterwards shots were heard near by, which directed the assembled neighbors to a spot twenty rods away, where the murderer was found lying in a pool of blood, having shot himself. The cause of the crime is traceable to an unbalanced mind caused by dissolute habits. A few days ago the murderer gave to Chas. Clark a sealed manuscript, requesting him not to open it till some time in the future, that he would soon go away, and that the letter would show why he went and where he would be. The papers were read to-day, and revealed the determination of Edgar to kill his father and aunt and himself. Edgar was once in partnership in the business of making whips and was worth considerable property. Six years ago his wife procured a divorce on the ground of drunkenness. When his property was gone he led a bad life and got what money he could from his father until the latter refused to give any more.

A MYSTERY SOLVED.

Confessed on His Deathbed That He Murdered His Brother.

A special from Barnesville, O., says: Sixteen years ago Thomas McCall, jun., a son of Thomas McCall, a wealthy farmer, mysteriously disappeared. His father searched in vain and offered large rewards in hope of finding his son, but to no avail. The mystery was solved on Monday when Josephus McCall, a brother, who is at the point of death, confessed to killing his brother and throwing his body into an old well on the premises. He says he killed his brother during a quarrel, and knowing that he will die, makes this dying and truthful confession. There is great excitement in the neighborhood over the revelation. Josephus is about 40 years old and bears a hard name.

RETURNED FROM THE DEAD.

One More Reproduction of the Enoch Arden Romance in Real Life.

A Bangor, Me., despatch says: Just before the late war there sailed away from Machias, in this State, a captain of an American vessel bound for the Pacific. He was a well-to-do man, who apparently loved his family, which consisted of a wife and several children, all of whom he left in a beautiful home. He was never heard from until Tuesday last, save that late in 1861 there came a foreign letter, in a strange hand, announcing that the captain, whose name was Aaron Harvey, had died. The mother assumed the whole burden of the care and maintenance of the family, refusing from time to time all offers of marriage until twenty-one years had passed, when she married a Mr. Champion and settled twenty miles away from Bangor. A daughter, Elizabeth, also married, and all these years they have lived with the idea that the father was dead. There arrived in Kinduskeag, the home of the married daughter, on Tuesday last an aged and gray man who called for Mrs. Demmons, that being the daughter's married name, and to her declared that he was her long missing father. The daughter was only a child when he went away and did not recognize him, but in haste drove over to the home of her mother, soon returning with her. The old lady looked at the man and when she found voice it was made evident that he was no imposter, for she cried out, "Good Lord! Aaron, how came you back on earth?" A family consultation was now had, and it was decided to keep the matter as quiet as possible, but it is now known that the old man was wrecked in the Pacific in a comparatively isolated part of the world. The war prevented American shipping from sailing that way, ships of other nations did not come and the captain, knowing nothing of the war and believing that he should never again see his native land took a wife and settled down. He had an opportunity a few years ago to leave, which he did secretly, taking some wealth, but he was again shipwrecked and his treasure lost. He landed in Australia. Being poor he did not write home, but again acquired a competency and then set out for his old home in Machias. He got trace of his grown up daughter and appeared to her as above stated. All the parties are in good circumstances.

Manitoba News Notes.

It is expected that the Northern Pacific Road will be completed to Portage la Prairie by July 1st.

Edmonton, N.W.T., advices state that a prairie fire on the Stony Plain Indian Reserve started on Sunday last about 1 o'clock in the afternoon and raged until 7 in the evening. During that time fourteen Indians' houses were burned, besides nearly all the stables, fencing and hay belonging to the Indians; the school-house, workshop and stable of the Presbyterian Mission, with most of their contents, the dwelling of the missionary alone escaping, and a stable belonging to the Indian Agency. A sick Indian woman, who had to be moved hurriedly on account of the fire, died. The high wind and the dry condition of the grass and ground made it almost impossible to save anything. On the same afternoon fire swept down on the Little Mountain settlement, burning Murdoch McLeod's fencing, stables, granary, grain and farm machinery, leaving only his house standing, and W. Storey's fences, stables, hay and grain. The loss, especially to Messrs. McLeod and Storey, is very heavy.

A Paleolithic Man.

A Gainesville, Tex., despatch says: A strange discovery was made yesterday by a citizen in the northwestern district of this county. Having occasion to sink a well, Mr. Somms selected a spot in a valley near a ravine of great length, and which during heavy rains is transformed into a raging torrent, depositing in the valley limestone, gravel, mud and other debris. After reaching a considerable depth, and while in a formation of limestone gravel that had been found almost uninterruptedly from the surface down, Somms came upon the vertebræ and ribs of an animal. The ribs were about the size of a small pig's and rapidly tapered. When unearthed the remains were found to be those of a man of gigantic stature, whose body tapered like a serpent. Near the bones of the man's right hand was found a rude stone hatchet, which is said to be similar to the handiwork of the Paleolithic man.

DOMINION PARLIAMENT

Mr. Small moved that the rules be suspended in order to introduce a Bill from the Senate respecting the Board of Trade of the city of Toronto, and that the said Bill be now read a first, second and third time. He explained that the necessity for the Bill arose from the fact that the Toronto Board of Trade, which is now engaged in erecting a building to cost $400,000, has just discovered that it cannot hold real estate to an extent more than $250,000, and power was asked in the Bill to enable it to hold property to the value of half a million.

The motion was carried, and the Bill was passed through its various stages.

The following divorce Bills were read a third time and passed on formal divisions:

Act for the relief of George M. Bagwell.

Act for the relief of Arthur Wand.

Act for the relief of Henry Middleton.

Mr. Carling, in introducing the Bill respecting loans made to Mennonite settlers, said that in 1875 loans were made to those settlers and that repayment was guaranteed with six per cent. by a number of gentlemen in the county of Waterloo. The money was to have been repaid in four years. The settlers, however, met with serious reverses from grasshoppers and floods. The money had been repaid with interest at four per cent. up to 1888, and it was proposed to accept that in full of the claim.

The resolution was passed and a Bill founded on it was introduced.

Mr. Costigan, in moving the House into committee on the resolution to make better provision for the working of the Inland Revenue Act, said it was proposed to make the duty upon cigarettes $1 50 per thousand. This would be practically the same as at present except that the duty would not be collected upon weight as formerly.

Resolutions were passed, and a Bill founded upon them received its first reading.

On the second reading of the Bill respecting pensions for the Mounted Police,

Mr. Jones (Halifax) said the measure would impose an unnecessary burden on the taxpayers of the Dominion. He moved that the Bill be not read, but that it be resolved that a percentage be deducted from the salaries of the Mounted Police, and repaid with interest to them, on leaving the force, or to their families if they should die in the service.

Mr. Mills (Bothwell) opposed the Bill, because it is entirely contrary to the democratic principles of the country to adopt the pension system.

Mr. Watson said there was no urgency for this measure on the ground that it would encourage recruiting, because at the present time there are three applicants for every vacancy on the force. He did not favor the argument for the Bill that it would induce men to remain longer on the force, because he did not think long service was conducive to efficient citizenship afterwards.

Mr. McDonald (Huron) objected to the Bill because it was a continuation of what he termed the superannuation iniquity. He instanced a number of cases, showing the cost of the superannuation system. The Clerk of the House, for example, received a salary of $3,400 per annum, but afterwards $6 000 additional were paid annually to the superannuated officials who once filled that position.

The amendment was lost on a division, yeas 66, nays 106.

The Bill was read a second time, passed through committee, and was read a third time.

Sir John Thompson moved the third reading of the Bill to amend the Post Office Act.

Mr. White (Renfrew) moved in amendment that the Bill be referred back to the committee with instructions to amend it by providing that the registration fee on letters shall not exceed two cents.

The amendment was lost on division. Yeas, 55; nays, 85.

Mr. Jones objected to the proposal to increase the postal rate on drop letters to two cents. He quoted post-office statistics to show that the drop letter feature is self-supporting, and he moved in amendment that the rate on this class of letters remain at one cent.

Mr. Sproule supported the Bill, and expressed the belief that the Government should have gone farther and have imposed a rate of postage of one-half cent per pound on all newspapers.

The amendment was lost on division.

Mr. Watson moved in amendment that the legislation fee on tax and assessment notices, when mailed by municipal clerks, shall not exceed two cents.

The amendment was lost on division.

The Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Law and the Lady.

Patient man—Suppose she has run him so heavily into debt that he can't support her, because his creditors grab every dollar as quick as he gets it, besides ruining his business with their suits?

Lawyer—If for any reason whatever he fails to pay her the amount ordered he will be sent to jail for contempt of court.

Patient man—Suppose she drives him out of the house with a flatiron, and he's afraid to go back?

Lawyer—She can arrest him for desertion.

A COQUET.

"How absurdly disagreeable you can make yourself, Jack! But there, I'm not going to quarrel with you. How much longer are you going to keep me up to abuse me?" and Ruby laughed aloud in her usual saucy, tantalizing manner.

Jack looked at her, his face like a thundercloud, on which was written a stern determination; but she was in no way appalled by it. On the contrary, she looked at him gayly and carelessly, as if she were perfectly indifferent to him or his moods.

"Miss Howard," he began.

"Miss Howard!" she mimicked, mockingly. "Since when, pray? How ceremonious we grow, to be sure!"

He resumed, as if she had not interrupted him: "I will not detain you but a moment longer. While I am convinced that at the present time you are perfectly heartless, owing more to the unhappy way of your bringing up and to the influences and fashion of society than to natural hardness of heart——"

"Oh! thanks, thanks awfully; you are too good," she broke in again, laughingly. It was all as good as a burlesque to her, accustomed as she was to lovers' rantings.

"I am as firmly convinced," he went on in so calm a tone that it should have warned her that this meant more than an ordinary tiff, "that you love me, but, with your natural perverseness, will neither acknowledge it to yourself nor me."

As he said this—with an air of a judge pronouncing sentence on some unhappy prisoner—with his gray eyes fixed on her face with the sternest gaze they were capable of—in spite of herself the bloom on her soft, round cheek deepened to a bright red, and for an instant her saucy, mocking eyes fell before his. A transient smile passed over his gloomy face at this evidence of his power, and left it gloomier even than before. As he regarded the lovely, half-shy face before him he commenced again bitterly: "And why will you not yield to that love and make us both happy? I will tell you. You do not wish to be tied to one; to receive the love and homage of one is not to your taste. Oh, no; not for years to come. If I would wait patiently and in the meantime be always ready to dance attendance on all your whims, not noticing any one else, and always keeping in the background when a desirable flirtation came up, then, perhaps, if you didn't meet some one you preferred to me, after keeping me in suspense all that time, you might graciously condescend to marry me. But I decline to become the slave of any woman; and, as much as I love you, I am going to leave you forever."

"Ha, ha!" and her sweet, low laugh rang out like a chime of silvery bells. "The plot thickens. Please go on; it is as lovely as a play."

"I know and feel," said Jack, earnestly, "that we are especially suited to each other, and I believe that in time you will realize the truth of what I say and will regret me, even as I regret you now—but no more. I've already said too much—more than I intended. Good-bye," and, with a deep bow, he turned and left.

"Well, of all things!" she murmured. "Forever! Fudge! I'll see him to-morrow on the promenade the same as usual. He is delicious! I do like him the best when he asserts himself. He is grand when he gets enraged. He looks so stern and glares so, and is so unapproachable that I am almost afraid of him—the darling. If I don't look out he will end in making me marry him before the season is over. Of course, I shan't marry any one else; but I'm not going to hurry myself; there's plenty of time."

The next day Miss Ruby failed to meet Jack as usual. In fact, a week passed, and in all that time he had not called. She had missed his presence from ball and opera and every place that she had graced with her bright presence. At last, making a few inquiries, she found that Jack was out somewhere on the broad ocean on his way to China to join his brother, a tea merchant, and was likely to be absent a term of years.

Four years after Jack had gone Ruby was at a fashionable watering place. She was still the belle of every assemblage.

One day she was taking her morning stroll and feeling an unaccountable depression of spirits. Her great eyes were wearing their most absent look, and as they wandered over the crowd that was ever coming and going, she started violently, and her delicate, high-bred face turned as white as the filmy lace at her throat. She fixed an absorbed gaze on a vehicle that was slowly passing. The occupant was a broad-shouldered, grand-looking man dressed in gray. His shapely head was covered with a white straw hat; a pair of large, disfiguring spectacles of colored glass completely hid his eyes; his firm mouth was shaded with a long, brown mustache, and between his lips was the inevitable cigar. No whiskers hid his firm chin and fine rounded throat. A footman at his side was driving a span of spirited blacks. In an instant the equipage was hidden in the crowd, but Ruby's eyes would have known that face, that form, if it had been a far more fleeting glimpse. She drew a long breath, and by the time she reached her hotel and looked at herself in her room she was startled by the joyous brightness that sparkled in her eyes and beamed from every feature. All day her face wore an eager, expectant look; her eyes were ever watching for something. At the hop that night it was still the same. She withdrew early and sought her room, weary and heartsick.

"Oh!" she said aloud in a troubled voice, "does he know I am here, and still remain aloof?"

She sat there alone, white and sad; her face wet with tears; her heart torn with conflicting emotions, and a terrible fear that he had forgotten her. The next morning, after a sleepless night, she started out alone, her cheeks pale, her spirits drooping. She shaped her course for a hidden retreat behind the rocks where she had often dreamed away hours uninterrupted. As she neared the place she saw that her favorite rocky seat was already occupied by an intruder.

Her footsteps had given no sound on the soft sand. He had not heard her. She stood perfectly still, trembling so that she could scarcely stand. Here was the man for whose presence she had longed for all these sad years, and now she dared not speak to him. He might receive her penitence with scorn, and he might be married! Terrible, cruel thought! While this was passing through her mind she was startled by hearing some one coming that way whistling. Not wishing to be seen she sprang behind a convenient bowlder, just in time to escape the eyes of the new-comer, who was the same man she had seen with Jack the day before.

The man came up and stopped beside Jack, who said, impatiently: "Why did you come for me so soon?"

"Why, an' you said 'come in an hour,' and it is up sure."

"I don't believe it's up," Jack cried violently, "but because I am a poor blind stick you think you can fool me. But you can't. Go away and let me be in peace if you can, and don't dare to come near me again under an hour from now. Do you understand? An hour from now, a whole hour."

"Yes, sir, I understand," said poor Peter, deprecatingly, preparing to move off, after casting a glance at the watch he wore to make sure of the time.

"Stay," called Jack, irritably. "First tell me if any one is anywhere in sight. I don't want to sit here as a show for any one if I can help it."

"Not a soul, sir, to be seen," responded Peter, cheerily.

"Then clear out," was the gentle reply.

After Peter's retreating form was lost to view Ruby stole forth, pale and trembling—her cheeks moist with tears of pity. How wretched he looked how sad—how she pitied him. She forgot everything except her love for him and wished to comfort him. On the impulse of the moment she went to him and put both soft, round arms around his neck and laid her cheeks against his. Her sudden embrace aroused him effectually from the gloomy thoughts he was indulging in, and gave him a little shock. But as soon as he could collect his scattered senses he became aware that it was a woman! Yes, a woman! A mad woman, no doubt! Did she intend to strangle him, or what? The novelty of it pleased him. He remained perfectly still and awaited developments like a philosopher.

"Jack—Jack Hunter! Don't you know me?" said a tearful voice in his ear.

"Heavens! That voice! Ruby!" he cried, doubtingly, but nevertheless throwing both arms about her and drawing her to him, as he rained kisses on her face. At last he drew her gently down on the rock beside him and said: "My darling, words are not needed to tell me it is Ruby, or that you love me. But tell me—you are still free as I am?"

He did not ask how or why she happened to be there. He did not care. That she was there was the one supreme thought of that happy moment

"I am still Ruby Howard," she murmured in reply.

"Thank God!" he said reverently, "and for this hour. And now, will you, can you—heart of my heart, marry me, as I am—a blind man?"

"Yes, Jack, gladly, if you will have me. I have longed for you ever since you left me," she whispered.

"My treasure!" he cried. "It was cruel of me. We will never part again we will get married at once—within the week," he went on, in the eager, overmastering way that she well remembered. "Your people will not object, I fondly imagine, for I am rich, you know, and all that; besides I am only blind for a season. My blindness is the result of an accident—happy accident—that brought me home to consult a specialist. He tells me if I be patient and very careful I will see in six months, and perhaps sooner. Oh, if I could but only see now! But I can wait and I would not exchange places with any one on earth."

Somebody Stole His Baby's Body.

A New York despatch says: This statement has been put on file at the Bureau of Vital Statistics: I, John Carr, residing at No. 122 East 120th street, state that while on an elevated railroad car, Third avenue line, Monday morning about 11 o'clock, while on my way to the morgue for the purpose of burying an infant in the city cemetery, I fell asleep, and when I awoke, which was in the neighborhood of Grand street, some person had taken the cigar box which contained the remains of my child. I now return the permit for burial, as I have no body to bury. I work nights as a waiter in a restaurant, and consequently sleep in the daytime, and was sound asleep when the box was taken. The sickness of my wife prevented me from having my usual rest since last Saturday. JOHN CARR.

The manner of milking is important. A cow should be regularly, gently and yet quickly and thoroughly milked. Perfect quietness and gentleness should be maintained in all management of either the cow or the calf. By persisting in such a course of management for a few years a herd much more valuable than the ordinary mixed herd can be produced.

Experience

The world was made when a man was born,
He must taste for himself the forbidden springs.
He can never take warning from old-fashioned things,
He must fight as a boy, he must drink as a youth,
He must kiss, he must love, he must swear to the truth
Of the friend of his soul; he must laugh to scorn
The hint of deceit in woman's eyes—
They are clear as the wells of Paradise

And so he goes on till the world grows old,
Till his tongue has grown cautious, his heart has grown cold;
Till the smile leaves his mouth and the ring leaves his laugh,
And he shirks the bright headache you ask him to quaff.
He grows formal with men and with women polite,
And distrustful of both when they're out of his sight.
Then he eats for his palate and drinks for his head,
And loves for his pleasure, and 'tis time he were dead.

JOHN BOYLE O'REILLY.

A Letter from Home.

The hotel 'bus from the midnight train
Brought only one passenger through the rain;
A commercial tourist, weary and sad,
For trade had been dull and collections bad.

Not a single order was on his book,
The disgust he felt was shown in his look;
With a careless hand he wrote his name
On the page of a book unknown to fame.

The drowsy night clerk the signature scanned,
Then a letter placed in the drummer's hand;
See how he starts, what a smile of delight
Comes over his face at the welcome sight.

Open the envelope is quickly torn,
And over his face so weary and worn
Now flits, like sunbeams after a storm,
Smiles of joy as the message takes form.

Thus clouds of despair that will often appear
To the travelling man sometimes in the year
Are quickly dispelled by such simple means
As one friendly letter—How queer it seems!

So wives, sweethearts, brothers and chums,
If you know where we'll be when Sunday comes,
Write us if your time will permit,
Draw on us at sight and we will remit—OUR THANKS.

Day Dreams.

How they come and how they go,
Ever fleeting, never slow,
Sailing up to heaven;
Tiny, subtle, wayward things,
Brilliant meteors, sparkling rings,
Which flash, and then are riven:

How they go and how they come,
Some so restful, yearning some;
Others like wild flowers;
Some like fragrant, even wind;
Some like clouds upon the mind,
Which, later, turn to showers.

How they come and how they go,
Born in sorrow, nursed in woe!
Oh, happy, useless dreaming!
Rainbow tinted, many starred,
Tear drops shed, sweet fancies marred—
Is all to end in seeming?

WANTED TO JINE.

But Jim Finally Concluded That He Wouldn't be a Mormon.

While waiting at a station in South Carolina one day, writes M Quad in the Detroit Free Press, I was joined by a man who carried an old-fashioned satchel on his shoulder, and who had evidently walked many miles through the mud. He was fully 60 years of age, scrawny and homely, and he simply nodded to me and sat down on a bale of cotton. In about 10 minutes along came a woman in home-spun, fully his age and about as homely. She had also had a long walk. She nodded to me and sat down on another cotton bale. Not a word was said between us for 10 minutes. Then as the whistle of the train was heard in the distance she said to the man:

"Then, Jim, you ar' gwine off ter jine the Mormons?"

"I am, Hannah," he replied.

"And you won't take me?"

"No."

"And I'm to be left?"

"Yes."

"And it won't do no good to argufy?"

"Not a bit."

"Wall, then, good bye to you."

She started forward with extended arm, but passed his hand and seized the satchel and flung it thirty feet away. Then she grabbed him by the hair and they went off the platform into a mud hole together, and as the train moved away she was on top and jamming his head into the old gold soil and saying between the jams:

"Want to jine the Mormons, do you! Want to leave the old wife who's dun lived with you 40 years! Want to jine—jine—jine, you old rabbit, you!"

And fifty passengers gave her three cheers and a tiger as she got a new hold on his atriarchal whiskers.

Royalty at the Races.

There was the smartest show of dresses at Sandown races that has been seen this season, says London Truth. Grays, green and black, and various shades of terra-cotta and brown, seemed to predominate, though two or three white costumes shone bravely in the spring sun, and one lady, whose olive green dress was adorned with a broad band of vivid brick color, was as conspicuous as a lighthouse. Soldiers and soldiers' wives, sisters, cousins and aunts, thronged the enclosure, and the air was full of regimental "shop." There were many drags, and much eating and drinking upon and around them. Royalty was present on both days—the Prince and Princess on Friday, and the Prince alone on Saturday. The Princess looked charming in a simple gray dress, trimmed with astrachan and contrived to make the smartly dressed ladies appear very ordinary. I am a Radical, but granting, for the sake of argument, the necessity for a Queen, I must say that I have never seen a woman who so perfectly looks the part as the Princess.

ABOUT CARPETS.

Some Hints Which are Very Seasonable Just Now.

"What do you mean by the 'standard?'"

"Look at this piece of ingrain. You see the threads are interwoven—across and lengthwise. Now, a thread running across we call a 'pick.' Count the number of 'picks' in an inch. There should be fourteen. That is the way we make our 'standard.' If there are one, two or three less than fourteen you see the carpet is far more loosely woven and less durable, though you wouldn't notice the difference on the surface. An ingrain, you know, consists of several thicknesses or layers of threads woven together—'ply,' as we say—that is, a two-ply carpet is two thicknesses of thread, and a three-ply three. The three-ply is the carpet of our grandmothers. After having fallen into disuse for many years it is coming in again. No, I don't think the rage for the antique has anything to do with it; people are beginning to believe again in its serviceability, that is all. So much for the cheaper carpets. The more expensive kinds, the Brussels and the Wiltons, are woven on a rack upon wires running crosswise. The standard is ten to an inch. The wires being drawn, semi-cylindrical tubes of wool are left. This is the surface of the Brussels carpet. The Wiltons differ in this way, that the tubes of wool are woven thicker and higher. The wires here have a knife attachment on the end, and, upon being withdrawn by machinery, split directly through the top of the tiny tube. A rich and plush-like surface is thus formed. Here you can get effects and delicacy of tints and shades that you can't have in a Brussels carpet. Compare these two pieces," and he threw on the floor side by side a Wilton and a Brussels. "Now, these are exactly the same pattern. That is evident, made of exactly the same shade and kind of wool. That is not so evident, for it doesn't seem so in the least; their effect is totally different. The plush and velvety surface of the Wilton has a softness, a richness, a delicacy which make the Brussels look flat beside it. Still, you wouldn't notice the difference unless you compare them directly as we have been doing. This carpet, the Wilton, is thicker and finer and heavier and handsomer than the other, but it costs just about twice as much. An Axminster? Oh, that is the finest of all."

Why Are Deserts Barren?

Why are deserts rocky and sandy? The answer is that without vegetation there is no such thing as soil on earth anywhere. The top layer of the land in all ordinary countries is composed entirely of vegetable mould, the decaying remains of innumerable generations of weeds and grasses. Earth to earth is the rule of nature. Soil, in fact, consists entirely of dead leaves. And where there are no leaves to die and decay there can be no mould or soil to speak of. Darwin showed in his last great book that we owe the whole earthly covering of our hills and plains almost entirely to the perennial exertions of that friend of the farmer, the harmless, necessary earthworm. Year after year the silent worker is busy every night pulling down leaves through his tunnelled burrow into his underground nest, and there converting them, by means of his castings, into the black mould which produces in the end for lordly man all his cultivable fields and pasture lands and meadows. Where there are no leaves and no earthworms, there can be no soil, and under those circumstances we get what we familiarly know as a desert. When new land rises above the sea it first emerges bare and rugged like a sea cliff. No living thing is harbored on its naked surface. In time, as rain falls upon its jutted peaks and barren pinnacles, the rock crumbles, and streams wash down deposits of sand and mud into the valleys and hollows. Lichens begin to spring in patches on the bare face of the rock, and ferns, whose spores have been wafted by the wind or carried by the waves or borne on the feet of unconscious birds, sprout here and there from the clefts and crannies. These, as they die and decay, form a thin layer of vegetable mould, the first beginning of a local soil, in which the earthworm—imported in the egg on driftwood or floating weeds—sets to burrow, and which increases by his constant labor. On the soil thus deposited flowering plants and trees root themselves as fast as seeds, nuts and fruits are wafted to the island by various accidents from surrounding countries. The new land thrown up in the Gulf of Ceylon four years ago by the great eruption of Krakatoa has in this way already clothed itself from head to foot with a luxuriant sheet of ferns, mosses and other vegetation. —Cornhill Magazine.

A Thief's Novel Disguise.

The man who has done so much horse stealing in the western part of Queen's county is locked up at Newton. He was apprehended at Trenton, New Jersey, having in his possession a horse which was one of a team that he stole from Peter Luyster, of Newton, last Sunday night. The other horse was found in a stable in Brooklyn. No trace, however, has been obtained of the four horses that he stole from F. W. Dunton, of Morris Parks, or the fine animal he took from Mr. Van Pelt, of Corona. He has been identified as the man who was seen in the places named and had the horses in his possession at different places trying to dispose of them. On these occasions he appeared to have two eyes. When arrested he had but one eye and his identification was not easily established. A glass eye was found in his clothes and when placed in the socket every person recognized him.—Brooklyn Eagle.

MANAGING STOVES.

Some Points on the Economy of Fuel in the Household.

How to minimize the expense of heating is a question of vital importance to the majority of citizens. What was recently pointed out relative to the wasteful use of coal for manufacturing purposes is no less true of coal for domestic uses. Few families get anything like the maximum caloric power out of their fuel, and the reason is largely their own lack of knowledge or their carelessness. With the exception of Kentucky and Arkansas lignite, which runs very low in caloric power, the differences between various kinds of coal are, after all, merely nominal, and the question of economy in coal resolves itself largely into one of use or treatment. The management of fires is the one important thing for people who wish to economize to post themselves on. As in factories, so in private dwellings, different fuels require different treatment. The harder the coal and the stronger the draught the thicker should be the bed of coals, or, in other words, the deeper should be the fire-pot. Hence size of stove, height of chimney, supplying of fuel, and judicious shaking or poking of the fire are important factors in the economy of fuel. In a general way the loss of heat results from one or other of three or four causes. Whenever the products of combustion are removed at too high a temperature, or there is a greater influx of air than is necessary to keep the fire sufficiently lively, or warm ashes or cinders are precipitated too soon, or the combustion is imperfect, there necessarily results a great loss of heat. So far as imperfect combustion is concerned, the escape of combustible gases, the fall of coal into the ashpan, and the precipitation of carbon as soot are the chief causes. Now, these are facts that the masses are apt to overlook, and in a measure they are all under the control of the one managing the fire. It will be noticed that the only effort usually made to reclaim this loss is to sift out of the ashes the bits of coal that have dropped down. Why not aim to save the other lost products? To begin with, there is no economy in small stoves. A stove with a large fire-pot can be run lower in point of heat and expense than a smaller stove. The thickness of coals over the grate can be better adjusted to the draught. A greater or less accumulation of ashes on the bottom of the pot is all that is necessary to regulate this matter. Poking and shaking should be avoided as much as possible, and the large stove requires this less than the smaller one. There is thus less partially burned coal precipitated into the ashpan, and the heat of the ashes constantly accumulating in the fire-pot is utilized to the fullest. When these are poked or shaken down they cool almost immediately, and the heat is lost. Another important point is the care given to the draught. No stove should be forced any more than possible, and with proper attention the necessity for forcing can be minimized. Combustion requires that the constituents of the air and the fuel should unite in exact proportions. Too much or too little air will entail loss of heat. As the quantity of air admitted into the stove in a given time increases its velocity is accelerated, and the air passes up the chimney in a highly heated condition and bears off heat in the measure of the volume and velocity of the current. If too little air is admitted, carbonic oxide instead of carbonic acid is developed and passes away in like manner. Hence a fire-pot adequate to the needs of draught, the avoidance of poking out hot ashes into the ash-pan and of disturbing the coals, and the closing of all direct draughts of the stove that would afford egress for hot air, gasses, and unconsumed carbon in the form of soot are factors in the economy of fuel more important than the selection of the material.

COAL AND PHILANTHROPY.

An English Dealer Fined for Giving His Customers Overweight.

"Do good by stealth and blush to find it fame" may have been excellent advice when Mr. Pope wrote, but it would require reshaping to bring it into harmony with modern requirements. A Yorkshire coal dealer, who has been doing good by stealth on quite an extensive scale, now has cause to blush at finding himself fined by a police magistrate. The philanthropic trader owns a weighing machine which gives his customers 21 lbs. overweight on every hundredweight. Some time ago his attention was officially drawn to the fact, and he received solid warning that if he continued his sinful benevolence he would be summoned. A weighing machine that gives overweight is as illegal as one that does the other thing, the law demanding a perfect adjustment of balance. This coally Samaritan refused to believe, however, that his stealthy benefactions were punishable, and so persisted in adding the little bonus to every hundredweight of black diamonds that left his shop. A fine of 5s. and costs is the result, the bench expressing the opinion that it looked a little hard to punish a man for cheating himself to benefit his customers. It does look hard, no doubt, but what a splendid advertisement.—London Globe.

Wash Your Hands.

Cases of infection that could be accounted for in no other way have been explained by the fingers as a vehicle. In handling money, especially of paper, door knobs, banisters, car straps and a hundred things that every one must frequently touch, there are chances innumerable of picking up germs of typhoid, scarlatina, diphtheria, smallpox, etc. Yet some persons actually put such things in their mouths, if not too large! Before eating, or touching that which is to be eaten, the hands should be immediately and scrupulously washed. We hear much about general cleanliness as "next to godliness." It may be added that here, in particular, it is also ahead of health and safety. The Jews made no mistake in that "except they washed they ate not." It was a sanitary ordinance as well as an ordinance of decency.

SOMETHING IN A NAME.

How a Member of the Smith Family Ended a Dilemma.

James Smith suffered some trouble from his surname. Sydney Smith is reported to have named his sons Douglas and Wyndham, not that he had any connection with these noble families, but to distinguish them from the other Smiths. James Smith, when a solicitor, says a writer in "Temple Bar" for March, was very much troubled by another James Smith, who came to live in the same house. Deeds and confidential secrets went to the wrong Smith. James Smith determined to put an end to the dilemma, and told the new arrival he must leave. "Why should I leave?" said the intruder. "Because," said James Smith, "you are James the second, and must abdicate." There is something in a name. The Duke of Newcastle, of borough mongering celebrity, was once asked for a day's fishing by a newly arrived clergyman. The reply was: "The Duke of Newcastle cannot comply with Mr. Nose's request. P. S.—Finding Mr. Nose's name is Rose, he is pleased to grant his request."

A Scotch Courtship.

I knew a young fellow who was very sweet on a Scotch spinster. She was a wealthy Scotch spinster, but if there is a kind of woman who must be loved economically and for herself alone it is a Scotch spinster. Scotch spinsters are warranted to make good wives all the time. It is awfully hard to be untrue to a Scotch woman. She makes you so very comfortable and holds you to her not so much by your heart as by your bank account. She doesn't always want new bonnets; she is rather liable to object even to your having a new hat until the old one is quite worn out. A Scotch wife can keep her husband neat and trim and herself and her children as well at a smaller expense than any other. She doesn't want diamond ear-rings for her birthday. All you have to do is to show her your bank account and kiss her and tell her you owe the balance to her, and she is quite satisfied. This young fellow did not understand the Scotch spinster, and when he thought to please her he sent her a lovely and expensive basket of flowers. He went up to receive her thanks and smiles, and he was quite knocked over when she told him that he hadn't a big enough salary to waste it in buying flowers for her or anybody else, and she was sorry to see he was so extravagant, because otherwise he was "a very pleasin' young man." He lied himself into her good graces by saying he had got the flowers for nothing, and he thought he could not make better use of them. She smiled graciously and said: "Seein' they did na' cost you anything it's a great compliment." She was a woman after all.—San Francisco Chronicle.

Popular Though He Did Not Dance.

A popular young man who, despite the fact that he does not dance, is rather prominent in the social life of the town, told me recently how he managed to transform his inability to dance into a new element of popularity. "I got the idea from a girl," he explained, "and I have frozen to it right along. I met her out one night, and observing that I was not dancing, she asked me if I never danced. I confessed that I did not, and went on to say that I was constantly bemoaning that fact. 'Undoubtedly,' she said, 'you must find it annoying at times; and yet if you know how to make use of it, do you know that in one way you have an advantage growing out of the very fact that you do not dance?' Of course I wanted an explanation. 'Why, it's simple enough,' she said. 'Never put your name down for a dance until toward the end of the evening. Then put your name down for just one dance with each of the girls in whom you are most interested. By the time that your dances are due the girls will have been dancing for hours, and will have become pretty well tired out. Then as you lead them out on the floor, propose a promenade instead of a dance, and depend upon it they will mentally bless you for your consideration—you will have gained far more than though you had danced with them ever so gracefully.' Well, I've tried that suggestion," continued the youth, "and I never knew it to fail. It's a great idea."—Albany Express.

Green the Popular Spring Shade.

What I was most struck by in this early display of summer millinery was the predominant color of green in everything. All the hats were symphonies in light shades of green. I thought perhaps the winter mind was merely startled by the color of ripe nature, and that probably these hats were no greener than they are every year, but in the next window I was confronted by a great assortment of gloves, some of them nearly a yard long. These were of the same shade of green as the hats. In another window were stockings just as green as the gloves. Then there was lovely silk underwear, likewise pale green. There were green parasols, and I assure you that one window contained a hat covered with light green roses. So, you see, the beautiful brightness of nature is to adorn our girls during the coming hot season. The shops are certainly well stocked for the Easter trade, and the sidewalks in front of the windows are constantly thronged with eager young women who rapturize over this dream of a bonnet or that love of a hat with an enthusiasm delightful to witness.—Clara Belle's Letter to the Indianapolis Journal.

Silk Dresses and New Bonnets.

"I haven't had a silk dress since I was married, nor a new bonnet for three seasons," complains Mrs. C. V. R. She declares she is bound to have a new bonnet if she has to work for it herself. This is true grit, but many ladies who would gladly work hard to attain a desired object are unable to do so because they are almost always constantly afflicted with diseases peculiar to their sex. Dragging-down pains, displacements, leucorrhea, and other uterine disorders are the bane of many women's lives; but Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription will cure where all other compounds fail. It is the only medicine for women, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee from the manufacturers that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrapper, and faithfully carried out for many years.

At a recent beggars' ball in Vienna there were 5,000 persons present, all in beggars' costumes.

HARRYING WOMEN AND BABIES.

The Brutal Evictions on the Olphert Estate at Falcarragh.

The police having ascertained that the houses had not been fortified left the battering ram and the bulk of their military and civil forces in reserve in the village. Only 60 constables accompanied the sheriff and his men throughout the distressing day. The houses visited were grouped together, rendering easier the work of the crowbar brigade. In some instances a feeble attempt at barricading had been made. The tenants of the first two houses found themselves on the roadside within a half hour of attack. At the third house the painful monotony of the proceedings was varied by a vigorous attack made upon the sheriff by the tenant's wife who, despite the incumbrance of a 7-weeks-old child in her arms, belabored the minion of the law with a stick until a policeman came to the rescue. The poor woman retreated inside and clung tenaciously to a bedpost, whence she was brutally torn by two burly bailiffs, the baby being almost killed in the struggle. Patrick O'Brien, M.P., at the risk of being sent to prison for another long term for obstructing the police, rescued the infant and lulled it to sleep with matronly skill. At the fourth house the bailiffs turned out a bed-ridden old dame despite indignant protests that the exposure would kill her. Real resistance was only offered at the last two houses visited, but the defences were so feeble that they were soon broken down, and the garrison, consisting all told of one man and ten women, were sent off to prison. Fourteen out of 70 families were evicted to-day.—London Correspondent of the New York Sun.

Wanted to be Heard From.

If any person has ever given Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy a fair trial, and has not been perfectly and permanently cured, that person should write the proprietors of that wonderful remedy, for they are in dead earnest and "mean business" when they offer $500 reward for a case of nasal catarrh, no matter how bad, or of how long standing, which they cannot cure. The Remedy is sold by druggists, at only 50 cents. It is mild, soothing, deodorizing, antiseptic, cleansing and healing.

The Singing-Teacher Dodge.

The following is the latest swindling scheme reported: A sleek party representing himself as a first-class singing teacher goes through a neighborhood and gets several of the best farmers to sign their names to a subscription paper. A very low price is asked, and no trouble is had in getting all the good ones he wants. The "teacher," of course, fails to put in an appearance after the names are obtained, but those who signed after a few days find their note at the bank for collection, the subscription paper being a promissory note payable to bearer. The singers have ample time to sing after the "teacher" has gone to look for more suckers. Is it possible that people will ever learn to carefully read papers which they are requested to sign by strangers?

Then he clasped her with emotion,
Drew the maiden to his breast,
Whispered vows of true devotion,
The old, old tale—you know the rest.
From his circled arms upspringing,
With a tear she turned away,
And her voice with sorrow ringing,
"I shall not see my bridal day."

This dramatic speech broke him up badly; but when she explained that her apprehensions were founded on the fact of an inherited predisposition to consumption in her family, he calmed her fears, bought a bottle of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery for her, and she is now the incarnation of health. For all bronchial, throat, and lung affections, it is a potent remedy.

Served Him Right.

"Is it true, Angelina," said a young lady addressing an acquaintance, "that there has been a rupture between you and Clarence De Johnes?" "It is quite true." "Gracious! What was the cause?" "He was addicted to the use of slang." "Oh!" "Yes, I begged him to discontinue the habit, but he persisted in it." "And the result?" "The result is he is in the soup."

Too Much Dandelion.

California has a new grievance—the dandelion. Some years ago it is said that a citizen imported from the east the seed of the old-fashioned dandelion. He wanted something to remind him of his early home. Like the man who imported the sparrow, he did worse than he knew. The sparrow is everywhere, so is the dandelion. The seed drifts in the wind like that of the thistle, the down is built into the nests of birds, and every seed which gets a lodgement on a lawn or grass plot will, in due time, produce a million more. Now the solitary dandelion is very attractive in bloom, and hardly less so when after the blossoms the gauze globe appears, and a few days afterward goes sailing off before the wind like a small balloon. But the citizen who is forced to dig up his lawn because a million dandelion roots have strangled the grass will utter no benediction over this rich golden blossom.—San Francisco Bulletin.

During the storm of yesterday (Wednesday) afternoon Mr. J. Brundage's house on Wellington street was struck by lightning. The ridgeboards were split and raised up, the electric fluid passing into the garrett and through a manhole to the rooms below. It finished its work of destruction in the kitchen, where it scattered plaster from the ceiling over the stove, killed a cat lying under it, and passed through the floor into the cellar Mrs. Brundage was standing beside the stove and received a severe shock. The house did not take fire. This is the second time Mrs. Brundage has been made the victim of lightning's freaks. Once, about ten years ago, while lying in bed sick, she was thrown from the head of the bed down to the foot.—[Shelburne Economist.

Considerable excitement was created in the neighborhood of Gordonville, West Luther, on Wednesday last says the Arthur Enterprise, by the conduct of a stranger who is either a desperate character or an escaped lunatic. It appears that on Tuesday a man having the appearance of a tramp, being poorly attired with a shoe on one foot and a boot on the other, and with the usual unkept and dirty characterists of the fraternity, called at the residence of Mr. William Fair and demanded money and food. Mr. Fair being from home the women of the house acceded to his request, giving him food and 25 cents in money. He then went to the barn and secured all the eggs he could find and left the premises. He returned next day however, and the women noticing his approach locked the doors. This apparent discourtsy incensed the villain and after parleying for awhile he drew a revolver and commenced a fusilade through the windows, one shot passing within an inch of a young woman's head, and another passing over a bed in which Mrs. Fair, who is an invalid, was lying. Apparently satisfied with his exploit, the desperado then withdrew. An attempt afterwards to discover and arrest him failed.

SO LONGER A MINISTER.

Dufferin Post : Rev. J.J. Dobbin, who has for two years been the esteemed and popular pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Caledon East, is no longer an accredited minister of the Gospel. He has lost his gown, and has been dismissed from the church in disgrace. The Presbytery began its labors on Tuesday afternoon, and sat all through Tuesday night. It was not until after five o'clock next morning that an adjournment was made. Shortly before rising the death sentence was passed on Mr. Dobbin. No more will he fill the pulpit which he has disgraced. The civil tribunal has acquitted him, but the Presbytery, which went into every detail of the charges, has decided that he is morally guilty, and, this being true, he is unfit to pursue any longer the divine avocation which he has disgraced. He falls, and the fall is a terrible one ! Ring down the curtain in sorrow and sadness !

General News.

The house of Pete Leroyer, who helped to arrest Donald Morrison, was burned down on Tuesday morning.

At a meeting of the Presbytery at Orangeville on the 23rd inst., the charges made against Rev. Mr. Dobbin were investigated. Quite a number of witnesses were examined, the result being that Mr. Dobbin was dismissed from the ministry. It is believed he intends appealing to the Synod against this decision.

THE METIS' CLAIMS.

Speaking of Gabriel Dumont, the Markdale Standard says: "In our humble opinion he should be strung up, even should lynch law be resorted to." It is a fortunate thing for this country that such opinions are exceedingly "humble." The advocacy of lynch law is something which no paper in Canada, excepting the Markdale Standard, would be guilty of. Mr. Rutledge should emigrate to Oklahoma, where such suggestions might probably be acted upon.

The Metis of the North West had a genuine grievance when they resorted to arms. Although rebellion is inexcusable in almost any case, yet these people deemed it their only course, and sacrificed themselves in a forlorn hope to better the condition of their families. Dumont was pardoned by the Government, and now simply asks that his people be indemnified for their losses in fighting for rights which the Government conceded. Dumont is not preaching another rebellion. The following from The Week will probably show the Standard that its suggestion is an extremely unworthy one:

"Mr. Davin has championed the case of the disaffected Half-breeds of the North-west, and there is undeniable force in his statement of the case. The Government is, he says is effect, claiming that because the Half-breeds of Manitoba years ago accepted certain terms from the Government in lieu of their claims as original settlers, therefore the Half-breeds of the territory who have nothing whatever to do with those of Manitoba, and were in no sense a party to the compact, are bound by the same arrangement and must accept the same terms. Apart altogether from the fairness or otherwise of that agreement and those terms, this mode of treatment would hardly be submitted to by any people of spirit. "If," says Mr. Davin, with logical directness, "you want the extinguishment of the Indian title, as it is known to rest in these North-west Half-breeds, you must go and bargain with them and with their children." This is sound and sensible advice. The failure of the government to act upon this simple, reasonable principle in dealing with these first settlers has already cost the country dear. Mr. Davin's suggestion that a clause liberally recognizing the claim of the Half-breeds of the North-west and providing for granting land scrip to them and their children, should be added to the act, and the Judge fo the Supreme Court in the North-west empowered to administer it, seems simple and practicable. Putting ourselves in the place of these poor people, does it not also seem just? And is it not in keeping with the prime object of the free-grant system—that of furthering the settlement and cultivation of the country? There is surely land enough for all, without being unfair or niggardly to the children or the original propritors."

It is quite amusing to note the eloquent self-laudation which the people of the United States are showering upon themselves. Last week they celebrated their Washington Centennial, and all the newspapers and orators in that country vied with each other in a hoarse shout of triumphant glorification over their achievements. The New York World waxed particularly eloquent and rolled out bombastic rodomontade by the square yard, after the following manner: "Sing, muse, of the festival of a hundred years! Sing the song of the centennial of Freemen, of Progress, of Enlightenment; sing the anthem of Power . . . Sing the Credo of Enfranchisement and the Gloria of the commonwealth of equal men." The average American is busily occupied just at present admiring his magnificent plumage, like the beautiful bird with a large tail, and has even brought himself to the state of belief, with James Russell Lowell, that his predecessors were all "men with empires in their brains," and he has inherited both.

Grey Assizes.

OWEN SOUND, May 6.—The Spring Assize sittings were opened here to-day at 2 p.m., Hon. Mr. Justice MacMahon presiding. There are set down for trial eight jury cases, four non jury and one criminal.

The case of Stinson v. Lee was taken up. The plaintiff, Rebecca Stinson, a married woman, and the defendant, A.F. D. Lee, were until lately both residents of Strathaven, but since the institution of the present proceedings defendant has left the country, and did not appear at the trial. The plaintiff had formerly been engaged at times to assist in domestic work at the house of the defendant, who was postmaster and kept a store in the village, and she alleged that he had at different times between the 15th and 29th of October last called at her house in the absense of her husband, and against her will kissed her, and on the 29 and 30th had been guilty of further improprieties and made insulting proposals to her. Under cross-examination she admitted that, although she had made entries in a book of the dates on which the liberties complained of were committed, she had never complained to any one of them until after the 29th. A letter written by plaintiff to defendant inviting him to come and settle by cash payment or note, was also put in. The plaintiff admitted that had he responded she would have settled the thing for $500, though she now claimed $1,000. The jury returned a verdict of $100. Masson, Q.C., for the defendant.

Albert Porter, a colored man, charged with malicious wounding, was found guilty of common assault and released on his own recognizance.

A very remarkable freak of nature exists on the farm of Mr. J.H. Carter, con. 8, lot 20, Township of Tecumseth, County of Lincoln, Bond Head P.O. On Saturday, April 14th, a cow belonging to Mr. Carter gave birth to two lambs and a calf. He is a respectable farmer who would not under any circumstances be guilty of any attempt to palm off a fraud on the public, and the issue has been seen by scores of his neighbors. The attendant circumstances were such as to leave no shadow of doubt on his mind as to correctness of the statement. The lambs are to all appearances perfect, but larger than ordinary. The calf, a male, is also perfect. The expression in the face of the lambs has a peculiarity, while considerable hair is mixed among the wool, both in the fleece and on the legs. Mr. Carter has already refused an offer of $600 for the dam and family. Mr. E. Jeff, lecturer on agriculture for Ontario, and many other gentlemen have been visitors. So far as known there is no parallel case on record.

Don't Marry a Man to Reform Him.

Don't marry a man to reform him!
To God and your own self be true!
Don't link to his vices your virtue—
You'll rue it, dear girl, if you do.

No matter how fervent his pleadings,
Be not by his promises led,
If he can't be a man while a-wooing,
He'll never be one when he's wed!

Don't marry a man to reform him—
To repent it, alas, when too late!
The mission of wives least successful
Is the making of crooked limbs straight.

There's many a maiden has tried it,
And proved it a failure at last;
Better tread life's pathway alone, dear,
Than wed with a lover that's "fast."

Mankind's much the same the world over
The exceptions you'll find are but few
When the rule is defeat and disaster
The chances are great against you.

Don't trust your bright hopes for the future,
The beautiful crown of your youth,
To the keeping of one who holds lightly
His fair name of honor and truth.

To "honor and love" you must promise
Don't pledge what you cannot fulfil!
If he'll have no respect for himself, dear,
Most surely, you then, never will.

'Tis told us the frown of a woman
Is strong as the blow of a man,
And the world will be better when women
Frown at error as hard as they can.

Make virtue the price of your favor;
Place wrong-doing under a ban
And let him who would win you and wed you
Prove himself in full measure a man.

ADVICE TO MOTHER.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of Cutting Teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for Children Teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers, there is no mistake about it. It cures Dysentery and Diarrhœa, regulates the Stomach and Bowels, cures Wind Colic, softens the Gums, reduces Inflamation and gives tone and energy to the whole system. The Old Rocking-Chair.

My grandmother sat in the old rocking-chair
(But she was not my grandmother then),
And her pert little face was bewitchingly fair
As she laughed a defiance to men!
Her sunbonnet fluttered like bird on its string,
Her hair wandered free on the breeze;
And gayly I ween did my grandmother sing
Underneath those old gnarl'd apple trees.

My grandfather rode through the white orchard gate,
And tethered his roan to a tree;
He'd a well-powder'd wig on his silly young pate,
And high tassel'd boots to his knee!
From the pink apple blossoms that over him hung,
He brush'd off the dew with his hat;
Till he came to the place where the rocking-chair swung
And my merry young grandmother sat.

The kingcup and daisy bloomed round in their pride,
And bees of their sweetness did sip;
But my grandfather blush'd and my grandfather sigh'd,
As he flick'd off their heads with his whip;
My granny she hummed her a cunning old song—
"Faint Heart Never Won Ladye Fair!"
So he wood and he prayed, and before very long
There sat two in that old rocking-chair

A NOVEL.

CHAPTER XX.

THE SHIPWRECK.

Gone! Gone like a stone in the water, like the path of a bird in the air. Gone, and no trace left by which to track her, no clew by which to find her. Had the earth opened and swallowed her up, or had a fiery chariot taken her to heaven, she could not have disappeared more wholly from the world, nor completely have effaced her path. She had gone, and no one could say when, nor where, nor how, nor whether she had been taken by force or had gone of her own free-will—whether she had been companioned or alone.

When Anthony came home rather late from his magisteral duties at that distant town, he found his household in consternation. Mrs. Harford, they said, had gone for a walk before luncheon and had not returned. No one had seen her save the nurse, who, as she passed the window, called into the inner room by the cry of the awaking child, caught a glimpse of her young mistress standing on the upper terrace, as if looking at the view beyond. When she repassed with the child Mrs. Harford was not there. Save for this rapid glimpse, which told nothing, no one else knew of her movements. The gardeners and work-people were at dinner; none of the servants were about; for the moment the place was deserted, and witness there was none. She had disappeared as if she had sunk into the central fire, or had evaporated like a dew-drop into space.

No search, however careful, which Anthony instituted, came on the footprints of his lost love.

He knew nothing of the return of Charlie Osborne to England, nor that he had suddenly left Kingshouse; still less that he had come to Thorbergh—called by mysterious summons which left the door open for all possibilities of intrigue and romance—nor that Mrs. Latimer's nephew had dropped down from the clouds on a visit to his old aunt. Who was to tell him all this? He had no casual correspondents at Kingshouse, and Mrs. Clanricarde had been as careful not to mention the fact of Charlie's return in her letters to Estelle as she was now to ignore it in her answering telegrams to Anthony. And even if he had known of his return, he would not have connected it with Estelle's strange disappearance. He would not have suspected her of flight with her old lover. That she could have deserted him, her child, her place, her honorable name of wife, her fair fame among women, for a girlish fancy that could never have justified itself by a serious union, and the very existence of which he had almost forgotten—no; he would have needed overwhelming proof before he could have believed her capable of this disgrace—she whose faults were surely not those of unbridled passion or carelessness of her duties and contempt of moral decencies.

He thought—and feared—that she might have killed herself in some fit of insanity following on the duller depression of her days. However much he tried to fight against it, deep down in his heart he knew she was not happy. His marriage was not a success. He had made heroic attempts to blind himself to the truth, and force himself to believe a lie. He had not succeeded. He had staked his all, and lost. And she had not deserted him for another. There was some explanation to this deadly mystery which would leave her as spotless as his love would have her—as nature had made her.

By degrees he ceased to think that she had died. She had gone, and gone of her own free-will. But some day she would come back. The mother's instinct would bring her, and the wife's love would reawaken. Some day she would stand before him, drooping, pentient, sweet and humble in her beauty. He would welcome her as the wintered earth welcomes the young spring, and love her the more for the pain she had made him undergo.

And thinking this, one day he opened her desk for love to touch what she had touched, and there he came upon a hoard of girlish treasures—of withered leaves and faded flowers; a lock of hair; a ring; a photograph; some letters—all religiously kept as sacred relics emblamed in perfumed paper—with dates and scraps of poetry; and everywhere the initials "C O.," or the full name "Charlie," "Charles Osborne," or "my beloved," or "my darling."

Then Anthony Harford took his revolver from the drawer where he always kept it, looked to the loading, and thrust it into his pocket. She should not suffer; but she should die. Her beauty should be undefaced, but she should no longer live to work ruin on men. He knew where to find her heart; and his own after. His revolver was trustworthy, and had been already baptized.

Meanwhile Estelle lived closely hidden behind the curtains at Mrs Latimer's. To outsiders, the house had changed in nothing, save that a young man, known to be Mrs. Latimer's nephew, was occasionally seen going out and coming in.

Estelle was grateful for the asylum that Mary and her mistress gave her. She resolutely forgot all that was not Charlie. Her husband, her child, her parents, her whole existence of those past bitter years, and all tha was outside him, she put away from her as we put away the memory of our fever dreams. She knew nothing of repentance, nothing of regret; and remorse would have been an infidelity of which she was incapable. Charlie was hers by the prescriptive right of love and time; and she had but gone back to her own and left the unlawful circumstances of the interval. Of all those circumstances her child was the only sacred spot, the only holy tie. And when the sound of its tender voice suddenly broke in on the ears we cannot stop, and its little hands seemed to wander over her face, and its clear and wondering eyes to look into hers, she would fling herself round Charlie's neck, and drown the remembrance of that thing which had been part of her very life in floods of caressing words which he rolled back on her in sweet and full replies. For husband she had no pity, no thought of even moderate regret. She looked on him as the executioner who had first deceived and then tortured her. It was only the child whose memory haunted her; and when that haunting reproachful little spectre rose as from a murdered bed before her eyes, she did what she could to harden her heart by remembering that her child was also his—and that part which was his deserved no love from her.

So the time passed till the summer had gone and the winter was at hand; then Charlie's health broke as once before, and the only chance of saving his life was by taking him to some warmer climate where he might live in the sun and forget the cold winds of the north.

Meanwhile they had had one or two scares, as once, when Anthony Harford came suddenly to the house, and Estelle had just time to rush up the stairs, carrying her work with her. He heard the "frou frou" of her dress as it swept the stairs, but he was not enlightened. No mystery of subtle sympathy told him who it was. It was the swish of a woman's gown and the hurrying patter of a woman's feet—in all probability the servant's—fleeing as for dear life itself for a clean apron or a smarter cap. He was not a man to naturally note much of the ways or doings of servant-maids; but this rapid flight of the gaunt woman who served his tenant struck him as odd; and why did he think of it so much? It was strange how those sounds vexed his imagination, oppressed though he was with that load of unspoken sorrow and unrealized suspicion!

He paid Mrs. Latimer a long visit this day, and it seemed to her, acting her part—to Mary, vigilant and anxious, the sentinel under arms, the pilot never taking his eyes from the horizon—to Estelle, upstairs in her bedroom, with the door ajar to hear the quicker and keener—to Charlie by her side unarmed, but feeling that for her he would either slay or be slain—it seemed to them all as if he would never go. And, truth to say, to Anthony himself there was a strange and nameless power of attraction which kept him in that darkened, stifling room talking to a half-imbecile old invalid, he did not know why, but could not withstand. At last, however, he went. And when he left the house he stopped and stood in the middle of the street looking at it curiously, and for a moment seemed about to re-enter. Another time a policeman came, looking at the scared inmates as if bristling with warrants for their apprehension. He was only charged with a message from the sanitary board relative to traps and overflows, and his visit passed as innocuously as Anthony's.

All these scares and fears were now at an end. Secretly, as they had come, unobserved of all, so secretly they withdrew—the fugitive wife and her childhood's lover; and no one knew the time, manner, or direction, nor who they were who took the midnight train to London and thence to the Continent, so cleverly were all things managed and all traces obliterated. They were sufficiently furnished with money from what Charlie had saved and what Estelle had received from him. The old lady, too, pressed on them a substantial gift, and altogether they made up a purse more than enough for their immediate wants. And then they passed away into space; and Anthony, who had brushed by their hiding-place unawares, had no warning to tell him of the distance now between Estelle and himself, as he had had none to tell him of her close neighborhood. Change of name; unbroken reticence on all their affairs, their relations, their home status their original roots; living to themselves wholly and mixing up with no one; by these means the two escaped all chance of detection and gave no cause for suspicion. They were simply like any other people—a beautiful young married couple to be met with on the sunny days in the lonely places of the Riviera—known to the post-office and their landlady as M. and Madame Charles—pitied as well as admired by all who saw them—for he looked as if he were what people call "struck for death," and she had a strange expression in her face as of one who was doomed and fated.

Only Mrs. Clanricarde had her suspicions, and only Mary and Mrs. Latimer knew the truth. But neither mother nor maid hinted a word of what the one thought and the other knew to Anthony Harford, eating out his heart in lonely anguish at Thrift.

At Kingshouse it gradually got to be known that Mr. Charles Osborne had gone to Thorbergh and young Mrs. Harford had left her husband simultaneously. The news went round in a whisper, that soon deepened into an audible voice enough, but Anthony at Thrift heard no echo, and knew nothing of what was common property to many. He had by now given up the search for his lost love.

BOOK THIRD.

CHAPTER I.

BY THE SEA-SHORE.

Two young people were sitting on a bench facing the sea and under the shadow of the ilex-trees. They were sitting hand in hand close together, radiant with the glossy happiness proper to a bride and bridegroom satisfied with each other and themselves. He was gallant, tender, caressing and she was a little shy, a little silly, and, as it might be, surprised, abashed, and fluttered by her own sensations.

The two on the bench, in their turn, were sitting close together hand in hand.

Said the good-looking young bridegroom on the heap of stones, with his clean-shaven face save for the delicate mustache, which he caressed lovingly, "And you really think this better than Kingshouse, Annette? You do not regret your fatal step?"

"You silly boy!" answered his companion, with an embarrassed little laugh. It would be unpolite to call it a giggle.

"But tell me, do you? I begin to think you do. Tell me, my pretty birdie, do you regret it."

"How can you be so silly! Yes, then, I do. There, now!" was the reply.

"Now you must do penance," returned the young man; and after some scuffling among the dry twigs and loosening stones, a few curiously stifled "don'ts," and as curiously checkered laughter, the penance was duly performed, and peace was re-established between the contending parties.

"I wish mother was here to keep you in order," said the girl as she settled her hat, which had got a little awry during the passge at arms.

"Do you?" was the answer. "I cannot say that I do, much as I love the old lady."

"Old! Meddy!" said Annette, in a tone of reproach. "Why, she is not fifty yet. That is one of the funny things at Kingshouse—none of the dowagers are old. Even the countess is not what you might call old, and she is the most ancient of them all."

"No; I grant you they are a fine set of matrons," said Meddy. "Upon my word, the last time I saw your special love, Mrs. Clanricarde, she looked about thirty. She is a wonderful get-up, I must say."

"Oh! but she paints and dyes, and does all that," said the bride, who four days ago was Anne Aspline, and now was Mrs Medlicott. "So no wonder she looks young, made up as she is. I wonder what has become of that dreadful Mrs. Harford?" she added, after a pause. "Fancy any well-brought-up girl leaving her husband and little baby for another man, and such a man as that dawdling, affected, good-for-nothing Mr. Osborne! It is really too dreadful! Such an awful shame!"

"But it is not quite sure that she left. You know it was thought she was killed," said the former curate of Kingshouse, now a full rector on his own account. A gentle kind of deprecation was in his voice. "You see, no trace of her has ever been found, and all that we can say is but surmise."

"They both disappeared at the same time, and of course they went away together," returned Anne, a little doggedly. The Clanricardes were the reddest of all the red rags in her mental store-closet. Good-natured to every one else, to them she was implacable. "We all know how madly in love with each other they were, and how Estelle hated her marriage with that awful bear—I don't blame her for that!—and how Mrs. Clanricarde manœuvred the whole thing, and put that advertisement in the paper, and all that. So how could it end but as it has?"

"Assuredly logic and sequential reasoning do not make part of my wife's mental furniture," thought Mr. Medlicott, while he caressed his mustache with one hand and held hers with the other. "Tell me, Annette, he said, suddenly; "did that Harford man ever make love to you."

"I don't know about making love," said Anne, with a girlish laugh. "He wanted to marry me, if that's what you call making love!"

"The scoundred! how dare he!" cried the bridegroom, with affected indignation. "I shall have to break his head for that!"

"If you intend to break the heads of all who liked me you will have enough to do, sir," said Anne, bridling.

"Confess, little wretch—'excellent wretch!'" said Mr. Medlicott. "How many? Who? Tell me, that I may make a note of them all, and punish them as their presumption deserves. Begin the roll-call Lord Eustace?"

"Well, yes; Lord Eustace liked me very much," said Aune, bravely. "I was always exceedingly careful, though, not to give him any encouragement, for I did not care about him personally, and I had no fancy to be the wife of an earl who had not enough money to keep up his title with. So I always cold-shouldered him, poor fellow! And so I did Mr. Osborne, who at one time was very sweet on me. I could have got him from Estelle Clanricarde, if I liked. But I always despised him, and would never have anything to say to him."

"Perhaps that monster of the money-bags, that gnome of the mines, Mr. Stagg, looked at you with those calf's eyes of his, and presumed to think you fascinating and delightful—as you are?" continued the gallant bridegroom, going on with his interrogatory.

"He!" said Anne, with something like a scream. "No, indeed! I would have made him remember it to the last day of his life, if he had! No. Lady Elizabeth may take him, now that Estelle Clanricarde cannot have him. He is rich enough to buy even Lady Elizabeth if he likes."

"I suppose now that old Stagg is dead, he has an enormous income—" said Mr. Medlicott.

"Enormous!" continued his wife. "I don't know how many thousands a year! What a shame that such a creature should be so rich, and others so far his superiors so poor!

"But I fancy the poor monster is not a bad monster at heart," said the apologetic bridegroom. "He is queer, but is a good fellow when you get at him."

On which the two went off into the lovers' paradise of babble, silliness, and mutual flattery; and the listeners on the bench facing the sea got up and slowly walked back on the narrow mountain-path by which they had come.

They walked on in silence, as they had sat, hearing all that had been poured forth by the former somewhat over-disdained antagonist. Estelle's pale cheeks were paler still; Charlie's had yet a deeper flush. They were so entirely all in all to each other—so shut out from the world and society—they had, as it were, forgotten the existence of those who knew their story. Love, which had united them, had also been their high-priest; and to neither her nor him was it as if they were living in or defying the laws. The sin had been her marriage, not now in their love, and her husband had no righteous cause of grief against her in that she had left him. She alone had the right to complain in that he had ever taken her. This was their normal state of feeling—the child lying as a secret, unnamed kind of terror between them—but when they heard the talk of Anne and her husband they realized to the full the position in which they stood as the world saw it and judged of it. Never separated, ever loving, they too were miserable in the hell which they would have said, when living, love would make a heaven. And these two young people, who also had lost all that makes life honorable among men for the love that been denied them, and the faith of which they had been cheated, were no more happy than were Francesca and Paolo, when Dante fell as fall the dead for pity of their story. The Nemesis we cannot escape, flee as fast as we will, was creeping up to them daily nearer and nearer. They had Love as their high-priest, truly, but Death was to be the avenger; and now they both, at least for the moment, realized the dishonor which surrounded them as things were, and which would close still more closly around Estelle when he had gone.

"I have been a brute. I have been awfully selfish," said Charlie, suddenly breaking the silence which had been so eloquent between them. "I was carried away by the passion, the despair of the moment; but I should have had more self-control; I should have resisted you and myself too."

"Hush!" said Estelle, called back to herself as his only, and not as any other's to hold disdain. "I cannot bear you to say that, Charlie. I would rather be with you than be the queen of the world. Do you think I care for what such a silly, weak-minded girl as Anne Aspline says? Do you think the blame of such a creature as that touches my love for you?"

"Your devotion does not make me less a selfish brute," said Charlie, tears in his eyes and voice.

She shook his hand and carried it to her lips.

"When I complain then blame yourself," she answered, with infinite grace and tenderness.

"But when I am dead, Estelle, who will you have then to love and care for you, to protect you, to make your life tolerable to you? Then you will find out to your sorrow all that you have lost for me, my poor unselfish darling; and I shall know it in heaven, and be unhappy in vain."

"I shall want no one," she said. "If you die, Charlie, I shall die too. So that need not trouble you here or in heaven. There is no one I should care to live for—no one whose love I would value if I had not you. No one!"

She slightly shivered as she said this. The image of the child she had left abandoned to the care of a hired nurse whose temper and heart she scarcely could guess, and certainly did not know, seemed to form itself before her from the crossing threads of the radiant atmosphere—like a cloudy shape just there within her grasp. But she shut her eyes and put the thing resolutely away, and felt as if she had killed something tender and beautiful, as she always did when this thought possessed her, this image appeared, and she would not receive it. Her tenderness was in vain, at least for the moment. Charlie would not be comforted. His conscience was aroused, and not all her assurances could lull it to sleep. Death was upon him, and he knew it.

After this unintentional eavesdropping, a certain nameless something came over both Estelle and Charlie. It was not that they loved each other less, but they were even more unhappy than before—and unhappy in a different way. Something besides sorrow of that all too certain separation was on them—something that stung him, and that made her as it were timid and in one sense reserved. They had lived in the fool's paradise of love, and had forgotten the world without. Now Anne Aspline's words had brought them back to the consciousness of the life that was beyond and without their own, and to the laws they had broken.

CHAPTER II.

THE FINGER OF SCORN.

The last three days had been sultry and oppressive. Horses were either restive or sullen, and when they did not plunge and kick, they jibbed and refused to go. Those who knew these signs looked anxious, as men foreseeing a catastrophe. All nature seemed distressed.

On the third day all these signs had increased in intensity. And then came the moment. Strange noises were heard in the earth like underground thunderings, or the muffled roar of an imprisoned creature in wrath and pain. The solid earth quivered and rocked. Houses fell into heaps of ruins as if pounded into dust. Here and there the earth opened and engulphed fields and farms and orchards where it was riven asunder; while over all the tumult arose the voice of human agony, going up to the pitiless heaven in one great cry of fear and pain that was half a reproach to the Force which hurt and half a prayer to the Power which could save. It was a time of universal wailing, and there was not a family which had not lost in love or in gear—and almost all had lost in both.

Down on the seaboard, where the strangers from far-off lands congregated, things were bad, but not so bad as higher up the hills. Here there was, on the whole, more fear than damage. Hotels shook and cracked, but did not fall; and the invalids who had come here for the sunshine of the sweet South suffered more from terror and exposure than from actual bodily hurt.

Among these were "two young lovers lately wed"—Anne Aspline and her husband, Mr. Medlicott.

Sitting there in the garden, Anne and her husband together. Mr. Medlicott soon gathered around him a small audience of those who attended the English church regularly on the Sundays, and went as regularly to Monte Carlo all the other days of the week. It was quite a triumph for the handsome young clergyman with his military air. His discourse betokened so many valuable qualities—presence of mind, physcial courage, sublime faith, scientific knowledge, and that intimate acquaintance with the Divine Will which endues man with ambassadorial functions; all these were manifest in the young clergyman's harangue, and made their mark accordingly. Spiritual assurance and pratical experience together worked a miracle of mental healing on these distracted folk. Men began to laugh and pretty women to giggle, while a few of the more courageous kind stole back into the hotel to adorn themselves as usual, and to make sure of their valuables, left open to pilferers in the haste of the moment. And while they were all dispersed in this wise there came two more shocks as voilent as the first had been, and the whole scene of terror and distraction was enacted anew.

These recurrent shocks finished the ruin of the upper villages to the plains and seaboard. A little later Anneand her husband were sitting in the same place as before, in the garden facing the sea, surrounded by the same admiring audience.

He was at one of the most moving passages of his extra-official thanksgiving when a hired carriage drove through the gate and up to the house door. It contained a young man and woman with a very slender amount of luggage, and as small a stock of health. He, indeed, was dying; she, as evidently fragile and broken-hearted, had yet a strangely resolute look in her gentle face, giving the impression of one keeping up by force of will for a special reason and a definite term—and then? They were among those whose habitation had been wrecked by the earthquake, and they had been the whole day foodless, helpless, strained, unable to find a conveyance to take them down to the hotels on the sea-shore, and with but little left of their modest possessions. They had scarce enough, indeed, for currents needs; and what money they had was buried in the ruins. Still they must live—and there was always that old friend and her rather mysterious mistress to fall back on. The landlord of the hotel, who had lost fully have of his guests, was glad enough to see this new arrival, unpromising as it looked. He took in the situation at a glance; but these English milords have inexhaustible supplies in their own country, and a day's accident is not a life's disaster. He was welcoming the young people with his best manner when the group in the garden broke up. It was to come in to dress for table d'hote.

Last of all the streaming little crowds, as it were, filtering through the door, came Mr. and Mrs. Medlicott. As they passed through the doorway into the hall they stood face to face with the new arrivals. Charlie, pale and half fainting, was sitting on the hall settee, coughing in the intervals of returning consciousness. Estelle was beside him, holding his head against her breast. The clean and well-regulated soul of Anne revolted at this rampant impropriety. Her whole being cried out shame and repudiation. She felt it to be impossible to stop under the same roof with these hardened sinners—these unmarried lovers who bore their iniquity so unblushingly. All the pride that she had herself had in her lawful wedded state seemed to sink into mire, to fall to the base level of this illegal union.

No sense of pity stirred the white soul of the once pure maiden, and now no less pure, because the unlawful wife. She, Anne Aspline, usually so quiet, so unobtrusive, so undemonstrative, left her husband's side, and with the air and manner of an indignant pythoness, pointing to the two sitting there in their misery, said to the landlord, in a loud voice, "If you take these two unmarried people into your house, I and my husband will leave it."

Had a thunder-bolt fallen, or another earthquake shaken the house, the consternation of all assembled would not have been greater.

"They are not married," she repeated, "and that woman has left her husband and child."

A murmur of reproach ran through the English. The native servants, however, looked at one another with a shrug that said: "What of that? Monsieur is dying, and madame is beautiful!"

Only one English person ventured on compassion. This was a woman no longer young in years, but still young in heart, and she went up to Charlie and Estelle, and ignoring what had been said by Mrs. Medlicott, asked them with infinite kindness if she could be of any use to them; and what they would do? where would they go? For the hotel-keeper, driven to the necessity of choice, had, wisely for himself, determined too keep the two who already had done his house some good, and whose departure would probably draw others too away, and had told these poor young newcomers, without too great expenditure of courtesy, that they must leave now on the instant—he would not give them rooms.

"There are other hotels," said Estelle, with all her old quiet dignity.

She neither failed nor blenched. This small spite of the former cook's daughter fell from her as something utterly unimportant. Side by side with her darling's state, what mattered it, or aught else? She was only sorry that she had to go forth to find another place. He was too fatigued already. But even that must be borne, and bravely.

"Your poor gentleman looks too ill for much exertion," said the lady.

"I would not stay here with that woman if I could," said Charlie, with a sick man's petulance. "Come, Estelle, let us get out of this place. It is pestilential, with that creature here!"

He spoke too feebly to be heard beyond those immediately beside him; and both Anne and her husband lost the words which, had they been heard, would have added fuel to the already raging flames. Kindly helped by the porters, to whom the master made a sign, and accompanied by the lady who had spoken to them, a certain Miss Ellistone, the two poor banished and outraged exiles—these descendants of the peccant pair who ate the forbidden fruit—went slowly out into the chill dusk of the dying day to seek for an asylum where there was no Anne Aspline to denounce them, and where their certificate of marriage was not asked for. All through that weary night there sounded in Estelle's ears the murmur of virtuous abhorrence and the rustling as of the drawing away of skirts which had greeted the damning announcement that she was no wife—a faithless wife and an unnatural mother—and that the man she loved and lived with was not her husband, but a fraud and a disgrace from whom, as from her, all honest women and honorable men did well to shrink.

A London surgeon, in a daring flight of imagination, says that business men who occupy offices above the third story get flighty after a few years, and in default of a change become mildly insane.

A North Carolina man visiting in Brooklyn last Sunday went to Plymouth Church "just to hear Beecher and judge for himself." He may have judged for himself, but it is doubtful if he heard Beecher.

Madisonville, Ky., is the seat of a great reform. An ordinance there forbids brass bands from meeting "for the purpose of learning new pieces of music within 300 feet of a dwelling-house."

PRINCE ALBERT VICTOR.

An American Bride Suggested for Him—An Alliance Which Would be Popular in England.

A London cablegram says: The Queen's visit to the Prince and Princess of Wales at Sandringham ended yesterday morning, and the Queen returned to Windsor Castle yesterday afternoon. Much has been printed about this visit; little is really known except what happened in public. There is a theory that a family council has been held and that various family questions have been discussed. Supposing that to be true, no decision that could have been taken would be valid without the approval of Her Majesty's Ministers. Two subjects are said to occupy the Queen's mind—a financial settlement for the eldest son of the Prince of Wales, Prince Albert Victor, commonly called Prince Eddie, and his marriage. This Prince is now 25 years old and has no separate establishment, no income of his own, no wife, and no immediate prospect of marrying. No Minister has yet ventured to ask Parliament for an allowance. There would be opposition, and rather than face the discussion which is sure to be raised, the Prince of Wales himself is opposed to an application till his son marries. As he must marry a Protestant, his choice among the European daughters of royalty is strictly limited. None of them seems a favorite.

In these circumstances Sir Edward Sullivan has conceived the notion that the Prince should marry an American. Why should he not? asks Sir Edward; and he proceeds to argue the question at length. Such an alliance, he thinks, would bring about a closer intimacy between the two nations. Americans, in his opinion, would like to see one of Columbia's daughters sharing the throne of England—he had better have said the prospect of the throne—and thirty four millions in England would welcome with delight a Queen of their own blood, breed and speech. Sir Edward, like most Englishmen, admires the American girl, and the American people generally. He believes the two great English speaking peoples destined to rule the world, and advocates such a marriage on international and political grounds. This suggestion has been heard before, but perhaps nobody has seriously urged it except Sir Edward Sullivan. So strong is the feeling in England against more Anglo-German marriages that an Anglo-American alliance might well enough be popular for that, as for many other reasons.

An Extraordinary Invention.

A London correspondent writes: The extraordinary invention patented here by the Food Preservation Company, which, by means of a vapor, succeeds in fortifying all food against putrefaction, and keeping it sweet and fresh, is likely to have an enormous influence on the frozen meat trade At present the cost of freezing mutton and transmitting it in refrigerating chambers from the antipodes is about 2½d. per lb.—that is, 10s. 5d. per sheep of 50 lbs. But by the new process, I learn that half a dozen sheep can be "preserved" at a cost of 6d. or 7d., and the freight for these as ordinary cargo, as which, it is asserted, they may be shipped after treatment, would be under ½d. per lb., or 2s. 1d. per sheep of 50 lbs. Thus the whole cost of preservation and transit would be 2s. 2d. per sheep, against 10s. 5d. by the freezing process. These figures speak for themselves.

Another blunder, and the biggest ever made, was the appointment of Joseph Royal as a member of the commission, for certainly he was the wrong man. Riel himself would have had nothing to do with him, and far less the Metis population. On his arrival at Batoche he would have met with a well-organized guard, and been lodged in a secure lock-up, there to repent his past actions in durance vile, for the history of Joseph Royal has never been made public, and well knowing himself that there was nothing good for him in Batoche, he turned back from Qu'Appelle with a lengthy report, turned out to please his leaders and thereby gaining some notoriety. The feeling of the Metis at this time was to meet Roger Goulet. The appearance of this man at Batoche would have stopped the Northwest troubles, and if the Government had acted wisely, and sent out one Goulet to every one hundred Middleton's, history to-day would not contain on its pages what it does unfortunately contain.

He says the half-breeds had four killed at Duck Lake, six at Fish Creek and eleven at Batoche. He gives the names.

A Cork Bonnet.

A clever milliner—and not a French milliner either—at the Ladies' Dress Association in London has invented a cork bonnet. It is built wholly of the bark of the cork tree, and the milliner says she had some trouble in getting such odd materials made up. It is an ordinary shaped bonnet, that would suit any woman, and is trimmed with rosebuds and leaves and green ribbon. The bonnet is very light. Alsatian bonnets, although they look very flat, have been modified lately with ospreys, passementerie and gold lace. They are very quiet and ladylike. Nearly all the milliners, however, say that they are not popular yet. A hat at the Dress Association was trimmed with daisies, butterflies and foliage. It had a streamer of daisies behind. This was a model, and had been copied many times, but always with a streamer.

YOUNG KING BENJAMIN.

A Yankee Sailor Who Has Twenty Wives and Fifty Children.

George Wright, who arrived in San Francisco on the steamer Australia a day or two ago from the Caroline Islands, tells the story of the sudden rise of a sailor to distinction in one of the largest islands of an archipelago, seventy-five miles west of Hawels, where Mr. Wright has a trading store.

"The sailor," said Mr. Wright, "is Carl Benjamin, and he has no less than twenty odd wives and fifty copper-colored children. He was wrecked in the schooner Bombazine off the Ladrone Islands nine years ago, and floated at sea on a raft a couple of weeks before he struck land.

"If you will look at a map you will find lying midway between the Tropic of Cancer and the equator thirteen dots. On some maps they appear marked 'Thirteen islands, well inhabited.' Well, it is on the biggest one of these, called Benjamin Island, in honor of himself, that he has taken up his home. It seems odd that an island as big as this has not been got down finer by the geographers, but it remains practically a terra incognita, although it is ten by twenty odd miles in extent.

"'Well inhabited' means that there is quite a sprinkling of dark-skinned native residents there, as well as many men who move to and fro in their light native boats. They eat bread fruit, bananas, cocoanuts and fish, and that's the end of it. They don't work at all.

"Benjamin has got to be a king in his far-away home. There the white-capped waves beat against the coral shores, and Benjamin has got nothing at all to do but to go swimming in the surf, talk the native gibberish, which he has learned, or loll under a palm tree. Some times he has his wives fan him while he smokes the kaziba leaf, which grows so plentifully there, and which, after you get to using it, you like better than tobacco. Maybe you think he hasn't a soft thing of it.

"However, Benjamin is doing some good work there, despite the hot climate. He carried three or four books with him on his raft—the last thing you would expect—and he has continued to instruct the natives in the English language. Benjamin is an American of German or Jewish descent, and is a lover of books. The first thing he did was to select an intelligent native and teach him the alphabet. He learned rapidly, and soon began to teach it to others, and a number of them can now speak English, while the rising generation immediately around are gradually picking up a primitive knowledge of the language. Benjamin is looked upon as a sage. All the chiefs come to him for points, and of their own accord they have made him their reigning potentate. The chiefs, of whom there are three, are his Cabinet.

"Benjamin has picked out the handsomest women for wives. They esteem it an honor and readily acknowledge him as their lord and master. He lives in a straggling bamboo village, the village of Ki, on a coral reef. His children are a sprightly, lively lot. Nobody bothers much about clothes away down there in the South Pacific. Still, he wears a little something, as do some of the natives, thanks to his teachings, for he has instructed them that there is no civilization without some clothes.

"He is about 30 years old and came from Newburyport, Mass., but says that he no longer has any desire to return to this country, and that he is perfectly contented to end his days there. He is the only white man, with one exception, for hundreds of miles around.

"He has taken to wearing a string of shells around his neck like the natives, and he sometimes imitates their example and puts dots of blue paint, got from a native shrub, on his face. This is only on State occasions, however, when there is a discussion of important question on hand with his subordinates.

"The permanent population of the island is perhaps not over 600 or 700. It is a very pretty and picturesque place, and the soil is very rich. It is indented with beautiful bays, whose shores are dotted with trees and shrubs of a tropical growth that are oftentimes covered with fragrant flowers. The island is about 600 miles west of the Marshall group."—San Francisco Examiner.

RUNAWAY HORSES.

A Good Way to Check Them With Little Danger.

When you see a runaway coming do not try to check him by a rush from the opposite direction or the side, for you will be immediately knocked flat by the collision, but instead prepare yourself for a short run with the horse. Measure with your eye the distance and start for the run while he is yet some way off, perhaps ten feet in the case of fair to medium runaways. You may depend upon his keeping a straight line, for a really frightened horse is half blind and would not veer for a steam engine. He will go straight ahead until he smashes into something. So do you get close to the line on which he is rushing, and, as he passes you, grasp the reins near the saddle. Gather the reins firmly, and then, leaning backward as you run, give them a powerful yank. You may be able to brace yourself somewhat as you give this yank, half sliding on your feet. The strong jerk on the bits tells the horse that he again has a master, and prepares him for the final struggle. A step or two forward after the first yank, do it again. This is the finishing stroke. It never fails when given by a determined man. The horse is on its haunches. Keep a firm pull on the rein till you grasp the horse by the nostrils, and hold him so until he is pacified.—Southern Cultivator.

Queer Italian Matrimony.

Last autumn Paola Manescalo lived in an Italian boarding house on James street. Germano Vecchio and his wife Josephine also lived there. Vecchio went to Italy and left his wife here. Josephine asked Manescalo to marry her. He consented, and they were pronounced man and wife by a Brooklyn magistrate. Soon afterward Vecchio returned from Italy and found his wife living happily with Manescalo. He made no disturbance, but quietly notified both that he must have her back. Josephine consented and returned. Manescalo made no protest, but thought it best to have his marriage annulled. This was done yesterday by Justice Bartlett in Brooklyn.

"Do you live with her now?' the Justice asked the first husband.

"Yes, Your Honor," replied Vecchio.

"Then this marriage has not interfered with the harmony of your domestic relations?"

"No, sir."

"This is one of the most extraordinary cases I have had the fortune to hear," concluded Justice Bartlett.—N. Y. Herald.

For the fourth time in English history the title of Duke of Buckingham has become extinct. In late Plantagenet times it was worn by cousins of the blood royal, who finally lost it through the interposition of the executioner's axe. Then the upstart Villiers family held it for a while, and then it died out, and in the next generation the Sheffields obtained it, and again also it died out. Now it disappears by the death of the late Duke, whose family name was Grenville, and who was a descendant of Henry VII. through his youngest daughter, Mary.

KATE WON THE RACE.

Three Milwaukee Girls Have a Wild Race on Horseback.

Miss Katie Peck, the lovely and dashing daughter of Editor Peck, of the Milwaukee Sun, and Misses Margaret and Jessie Sanderson, daughters of Ed. Sanderson, the large mill owner, secured saddle horses at a riding school and started out for a ride. They took a brisk canter to the Soldiers' Home and there met Mr. Sanderson in his buggy by appointment. The girls started to return and, touching up their horses a little, galloped away at a lively gait. The three horses were running together, head and head, and the young ladies did not notice that their steeds were gradually increasing their pace. Suddenly it dawned upon them. They pulled on their reins in vain, the only result being that the horses took longer, surer and faster strides. The blood of their Kentucky racing sires was up in each of the three "saddle horses." Down Long Arde avenue, which is Milwaukee's boulevard, they tore directly toward the heart of the city. First one was ahead and then the other. It was a grand race. With hair flying in the wind, for their hats had been blown away, the three girls, who were as thoroughbred as their steeds and as game, hung on to the reins and swung backward and forward with each stride. People on the streets saw them for an instant, and before they could hardly cry out they would dash by. They were riding at a racing gait. Suddenly, about two miles from Grand avenue bridge, Margaret Sanderson's horse began to fall back. As the other pair drew away he slackened his speed and the young lady jumped off. She was uninjured. For nearly a mile further it was a neck-and-neck race between the other pair. In front of the Schandein residence Miss Jessie Sanderson's horse swerved into the other, and the next instant she was hurled from the saddle. When picked up she was found to be only slightly bruised. The horse that Miss Peck rode was bred to run the old style, four miles and repeat. He kept right on. Down into the busy part of Grand avenue he dashed, and, as luck would have it, he was on the right side of the street and happened to get a clear track. Men saw him coming, and half a dozen would-be rescuers made daring dashes, but failed to stop him. Just three blocks from the Grand avenue bridge, where a terrible accident would have been unavoidable, a man jumped out into the street and held his ground. The horse swerved sharply, the saddle girths burst and the plucky, but exhausted girl was unhorsed, saddle and all, to the pavement. Nearly a hundred men rushed to her assistance, and she was carried into a store and a physician summoned. Under his treatment she speedily regained consciousness and was found to have sustained nothing more than a bad scalp wound. She was then taken to her home in a carriage. Mr. Sandereon following the runaways in his buggy, with his horse at a gallop, and picked up his two daughters on the way.

An old Riddle Rejuvenated

FOR THE CHILDREN

What boy or girl can send us the correct answer to the following riddle ?

"From yonder wall, I heard a call,"
And looked to see who it could be ;
A body dressed in super-best,
Not cloth, nor fur, nor hair, nor wool,
But yet it served the wearer full ;
A red, red crown upon his head,
Worn every day, and when "to bed,"
Legs, feet, and toes, bare as could be,
But yet for this, naught, naught cared he.
Two eyes, two ears, a pointed tongue,
Which served him when he talked or sung.
"His board was flesh, his mouth was horn,
Was such a creature ever born ?"

Would it not be a good idea for the pathmasters, while they are about the repairing of the Boyne Bridge sidewalk, to place said walk outside of the bridge, as the brick work is already very narrow, and nothing more than a narrow walk could be placed there ? Accident.

Mr. C. Howard met with a painful accident on Monday. His hand accidentally came in contact with a circular saw, and the result was that he lost the third finger of his left hand and had his thumb nearly amputated, but will save the latter. Drs. Carter and Christoe dressed the wounded member.

Get Married.

Every newly married couple may have The Advance as a wedding present free for six months, upon funishing satisfactory evidence of the marriage. This is a standing offer and application must be made six months from date of marriage.

Obit.

An esteemed friend from Eugenia sends us the following item : On Wednesday evening, Sarah, daughter of Mr. Hector Kennedy, after a long, but patiently borne illness, quietly passed into her eternal rest. By reason of her long illness her death was not unexpected, yet even though not unlooked for, it fell with saddening gloom on her family and friends. The young lady was in the bloom of womanhood, her age being only nineteen years and a month. While we offer our sympathy to the bereaved family we also feel a pleasure in recording the death of one whose terrors are veiled beneath the brightness that lightens the Valley of Death, and crimsons the dawn of the future in anticipation of a glorious resurrection. The funeral, which took place on Friday to the Methodist cemetery, Salem, was attended by a large concourse of friends and neighbors.

Inquest.

An inquest was held at Eugenia on Saturday afternoon upon the body of an infant child of Mary Walker. Ugly rumors had been in circulation, and having reached the corner's (Dr. Christoe) ears, he laid the matter before the county Crown Attorney, who instructed him to proceed. At 1 o'clock on Saturday, a jury was accordingly empannelled in the Orange Hall, Eugenia, and evidence heard from those who were intimate with the case, after which the jury unanimously exonerated everybody from blame and delivered the following verdict : "The jury on this case are unanimously agreed that the child was drowned, but that while the evidence clearly shows said child was born alive, there is nothing in the evidence to show that there was any intent to take the life of the child."

Special Announcement.

We have made arrangements with Dr. B. J. Kendal Co., publishers of "A Treatise of the Horse and his Diseases" which will enable all our subscribers to obtain a copy of the valuable work free by sending their address (enclosing a two-cent stamp for mailing same) to Dr. B.J. Kendall Co., Enosburgh Falls, Vt. This book is now recognized as standard authority upon all diseases of the horse, as its phenomenal sale attests, over four million copies have been sold in the past ten years, a sale never before reached by any publication in the same period of time. We feel confident that our patrons will appreciate the work, and be glad to avail themselves of this opportunity of obtaining a valuable book.

It is necessary that you mention this paper in sending for the "Treatise." This offer will remain open for only a short time.

Fishing.

I heard a prominent gentleman say the other day that he never fished in his life. I wanted to tell him that he was mistaken. Everybody fishes. We are all born fishermen. From the time our natal day ushers us into a happy or an unhappy existence we are all accomplished fishermen or women. Even the dummy before a tobacco store fishes for suckers, just as much as the young lady eighteen years of age. The young man casts his line into the sea of matrimony and pulls out a fat flounder or a sword fish that will in turn catch him on its sword and waft him around until he can't stand on his legs. The young lady goes fishing for ice cream and a gold fish, and generally lands both when she undertakes the job. The politician fishes for votes, the storekeeper fishes for customers, the boy for catfish, trout, perch, wet pants and a thrashing from dad when he gets home. The married man fishes energetically for lucre to keep the pot boiling, the married woman for news about Mrs. Jones and Mr. Jollygaloot, and the newspaper fiend turns the world upside down to catch a few subscribers. Oh, you bet we are all fishermen every day in the year and sometimes more. Call in and subscribe for this paper.

Artemesia Council.

The above Council met on Monday last, all the members present. Minutes of last meeting read and approved. A communication was read from the Minister of Education re separate school matters. Petition of school trustees of sections No. 3, 4, and 8 were presented, opposing any change in said sections, also petition of Thos. Elliott and others, asking for bridge over Saugeen river, town line Artemesia and Euphrasia, at lot 96, 2nd east. Bylaw No. 451, to regulate and encourage planting of trees in the township, was passed. Appropriations for road improvements were made as follows, on motion of Messrs. McArthur & Sharp : Ward No. 1, $150 ; ward No. 2, $120 ; ward No. 3, $180 ; ward No. 4, $150. The councillors were appointed commissioners for expending said amounts, to be allowed 8 per cent. commission for letting jobs.

On motion of Messrs. Cairns and McArthur it was decided to allow the school sections to remain as they are for the present, excepting lots 179 and 180, 2nd west, and 180 3rd west, which lots are to be taken from No. 3 sections and placed in No. 4

It was moved by Messrs. McArthur & Sharp that John Boland be and is hereby instructed to examine the propriety of building a bridge and opening the town line between Artemesia and Euphrasia, opposite lot No. 96, on the 2nd concession east. Carried.

Moved by Messrs. Cairns & Sharp, that John Noble be paid 58 cents for repairing scraper for Wm. Walker. Carried.

Moved by Messrs. Boland & McArthur, that Dr. Christoe be paid the sum of $4.50, expenses incurred in sending indigent to hospital ; also Mrs. Thompson $3.50, for care of sick man for nine days. Also that the reeve issue his order for day's session of Council and indigent monthly allowance. Carried.

Moved by Messrs McArthur & Sharp, that this Council meet as a court of revision on first Monday of June next. Carried.

This completed the business, and the Council adjourned

CORRESPONDENCE.

The School Question.

DEAR ADVANCE: Tyrone's letter in your issue of 2nd inst., is no improvement on his first, his figures for legal census returns for three years, if correct, are very discreditable to the census takes, as they are inexcusably astray. It was clearly proven to the County Board of Arbitrators, that the school population was up to the legal requirements in 1886. It was vigorously disputed at the time, so far as positive assertion could go, hence the necessity of the point having to be proven at the time, which was done by giving names to the Board, showing the number of school age persons to be over fifty. We believe it has never been less than fifty since, and to-day it is over fifty. This section was established by proof and not by sufferance, the territory of the section is small and surrounded by sections too large, surely it is no more than right to equalize a little. "Tyrone" thinks the council have great reason to be proud of itself; we are only too sorry we cannot endorse that, but beg to express the wise and hope that the council will not give way to pride, but go to work at once and re-arrange everything necessary in the school sections without fear or favor.

FLESHERTON STATION.

To the Editor of The Advance.

DEAR SIR—In your last week's issue there appeared a communication from your Priceville correspondent containing a statement which no doubt was intended as a slur upon teacher and pupils of "Hillside Academy." As I am evidently the person referred to I would therefore ask your Priceville correspondent for a clearer explanation of his insinuation. If he means to say that the regime of the aforesaid school is, and has been of, a doubtful and suspicious nature, then I give such assertions a most emphatic denial and can furnish abundant proof to substantiate my statements. There is a vigorous Anglo Saxon word of four letters which would be a very appropriate epithet in describing such a character as your nameless correspondent. What were the motives that incited him to publish such a loose fabrication is a mistery to me. Let him come out like a man and sign his own name if he has any old grudge to settle. This mean, low way of stabbing in the dark is very unsatisfactory to any one, and gives a person no fair chance whatever to retaliate. Thanking you Mr. Editor for the valuable space I have occupied, I remain,

Yours truly,
W. J. BLAKESTON.
Teacher of H. A.

Mr. J. Waring has had a severe attack of pleurisy. He is getting around again.

Spring seeding is about through. Warm weather and a good rain is needed.

Fall wheat is looking well.

Eugenia

From our own Correspondent.

We are pleased to see that Messrs. Akitt and Sloan, who have been confined to bed for some days by a severe cold, are able to be around again and attend to their business.

Mr. J. Bowerman and Mr Paul Sherwood have also recovered from attack of inflammation on the lungs.

Mr. Sloan's shingle mill is now going full blast.

Mr. Thos. Suggitt, who has been spending a few weeks visiting his father and the scenes of his boyhood, returned to Toronto last week.

Miss Samantha Watts left last week for Guelph, and Miss Minnie Watts is taking a course of music with a Kimberley musician.

The season of picnics has arrived, and on account of its rugged and romantic scenery there is no more popular place than Eugenia to hold a picnic for many miles around. Still it is strange that no person in the village has taken advantage of this fact and endeavored to make it still more attractive for tourists and pleasure seekers, besides obtaining for themselves a little pecuniary profit. Pleasure seekers are generally flush of money and good spenders. Of course the falls are the chief attraction, and the approach to them below by means of the stairway should be kept in repair. No person however, is willing to undertake the expense, without remuneration. I would suggest that the place be made secure. Have a gate or house at the head and keep it locked. This would serve in a great measure to keep the stairs from being destroyed. Charge a small fee, enough to cover all expenses, from those that go below, or rent the key for the day to the picnic party. The place by this plan would keep itself in repair. The stairway is at present in a very dilapidated condition. The supports are very much decayed and the railing gone, so that it is very unfit, even dangerous, to pass up or down. The authorities should see they are made safe or else have them removed before accidents happen, for the stairway is at present nothing more nor less than a huge man-trap, and people cannot know until they are on them whether they are safe or not.

The religious quarterley meeting was held in the Methodist Church, Eugenia, on Sabbath. Services were conducted morning and evening by the Rev. Mr. Steers of Markdale.

Kimberley.

From our own Correspondent.

The weather is very fine at present, and the leaves are coming out upon the trees. The grass and fall wheat are growing very fast.

We are glad to note that Miss Ella Carruthers is able to be around again after her attack of inflammation.

Fishing is the order of the day, but some fish in vain. One of our sportsmen went out the other day and fished for nearly half a day and caught nothing, but carried home enough water in his boots to wash him for months.

The Kimberley base ball has organized for the season, with Mr. C. Howe as captain, Mr. J. C. McConnell sec.

Quite a number of the citizens of this place met in the school house on Saturday evening last to consider the advisibility of erecting a union church It was decided to build a two story building, the basement to be used for public meetings, and the upper chamber for religious purposes.

Jim-Jam Valley.

"In the secluded Jim-Jam Valley of the San Bernardino Mountains" remarked Joe Joachinson, the pioneer of San Bernardino, yesterday, to a reporter at the Palace Hotel, "there are the most marvellous mirages known to the world. The wonderful mirages of the Mojave Desert have been talked about a good deal, and they are entitled to all the prominence they have had. But those of the Jim-Jam Valley are far more wonderful than these. It is called Jim-Jam Valley because of the strange things seen there, and I defy any man, however sound of mind he may be, to go in there, and not think he has got 'em before he gets out. This valley is about twenty-five miles long by fifteen miles wide. It is uninhabited. It is bordered by the main San Bernardino range on the east and by a spur of the Sierra Magdalenas on the west. There is no well-defined trail through the heart of it. The valley is a desert. The surrounding mountains are terribly cut up. The peaks are jagged. Altogether the surroundings are very weird and forbidding. Leaving Fisk's ranch on the trail at the foot of the Sierra Magdalenas, you climb an easy grade to Dead Man's Pass, the entrance to the valley. Go on in and pretty soon you see lakes and running rivers, and green borders, and flying water-fowl. Willows spring up here and there, and in the distance you see water lilies. What you behold contrasts finely with the rugged mountains, and you are charmed with it and go on thinking you have an earthly paradise. Indian camps appear in view, and lithe oarsmen propel fantastic crafts upon the waters. Advancing still further you see dim outlined forms, things whose outlines you can hardly express in words. Sombre countenances gleam at you from the air above. The lakes and rivers and the palid faces shift and change before your eyes. Sometimes a dozen of the more or less dimly outlined forms may be seen, and the pantomime reminds you of a strange hobgoblin dance. Sometimes a storm brews in the valley, and then the scene is all the more terrible. Forked lightning blazes about, and strange, uncouth animals, differing from any you have ever read about, are to be seen there. These phenomena are seen for a stretch of about fifteen miles up and down the middle of the valley principally, and they have been viewed by a great many people. They cannot understand why the forms of the mirage, if such it may be called, are so much more strange there than on the Mojave Desert. Everybody is in awe of the valley, and there are mighty few men, however nervy, who care to go there much."

Terrible inundations are reported from the Saguney district, and there is considerable poverty among the people.

WOMEN OF NERVE.

Two Ladies Each Tackle a Burglar and Win Fame.

ONE CAPTURES HER MAN.

An Alpena (Mich.) despatch says: About 4 o'clock on the morning of the 21st a girl who works at the residence of R. Bartlett, on Chisholm street, was awakened by a burglar who had broken into the house. Her cry of alarm caused the burglar to attack her. In the struggle that ensued the girl managed to seize one of the man's fingers in her mouth and she bit it severely. This sort of defence seemed to be unexpected by the burglar, and the girl, taking advantage of his confusion, let go the finger and called for help. The man now seized her by the throat, choked her a little, cuffed her some with his hand, and threatened her with violence if she did not cease making an alarm. The girl's screams aroused the rest of the inmates of the house and they hurried to her room to see what the matter was. The burglar heard them and beat a hasty retreat before they could capture him. He stole a small sum of money that was in the girl's dress. The girl saw enough of the burglar's face to recognize him if she sees him again.

The Waterbury (Conn.) American says: "Mrs. John P. Elton, of Church street, and her housemaid, Miss Sullivan, had a peculiar experience early Saturday morning. Miss Sullivan thought she heard a noise about 1.30 as if some person had broken a pane of glass in the rear of the house. She immediately left her bed and notified Mrs Elton. Mrs. Elton is over 70 years of age, but she evidently does not know what fear is. With a wonderful presence of mind and a bravery that would have done credit to the much-vaunted sterner sex, she went down stairs to the kitchen. There stood a man apparently helping himself to the eatables in the refrigerator. She asked him in a voice that showed no weakness what he wanted. The man, who was busy satisfying his appetite, made no answer. Thereupon Mrs. Elton, turning the key in the door leading to the other portion of the house, and still perfectly cool, went to the telephone, where she succeeded after a short time in summoning the police, who took him prisoner."

HE WAS TOO DAINTY.

Sent Out Invitations to His Own Funeral and Then Drowned Himself.

A New York despatch says: Oliver P. Lewis, aged 21, clad in a full-dress suit with a white rose in his buttonhole, climbed over the iron railing of the Central Park reservoir this morning, jumped into the water and drowned himself. He had spent the night at the Murray Hill Hotel, where he had written a number of notes to relatives and friends, informing them of his intentions, and about the time that the reservoir employees were pulling his body out of the water the police were sending out a general alarm in the hope of preventing the suicide. Lewis was a clerk in Johnson & Faulkner's upholstery store and lived with his mother and two sisters. He told them last night that he was going to a party. The notes he sent from the hotel were written on black-bordered paper and contained invitations to his funeral. In the pocket of his overcoat, which he hung on the railing before jumping into the water, was a prayer-book with the leaf turned down at the Episcopal burial service and a hymn-book with a certain hymn likewise designated, evidently to be used at the funeral. Though there was a diamond stud in his immaculate white tie, and gold and silver rings on his fingers, only a few pennies were found in his pockets. It is supposed that he killed himself because unable to live in a style equal to his tastes. His father is a livery-stable keeper who was not on good terms with his son, owing to the latter's dislike of plain ways. The fact that the mother and sisters had chosen to follow young Lewis in his onslaught upon metropolitan society had also led to a breaking-up of the family. The old gentleman, however, will pay the funeral expenses.

ONE MORE UNFORTUNATE.

In She Plunged Boldly No Matter How Coldly the Rough River Ran.

A Detroit despatch says: John Gilday and S. A. Joseph were chatting on Twelfth street wharf yesterday morning when they saw a young girl turn hurriedly off Woodbridge street on to Twelfth and walk toward them. She seemed to be agitated, and they scanned her closely on this account. She was of medium height, slight of frame, and wore a bonnet, a dark cloak and plaid dress. When about ten feet from the edge of the wharf she seemed for the first time to be aware of the presence of the two men and broke into a run towards the river. Before they could possibly interfere she had jumped off the wharf. A young man named Peters, clerk in the freight office of the Wabash Railway, at the foot of Twelfth street, heard the splash and saw men running, rushing out he grabbed a life preserver and threw it to the suicide, who had come up and was being carried down stream. The girl made no effort to clutch it, and about 400 yards below the wharf sank and was seen no more. No missing girl has been reported by any family, and the identity of the suicide is unknown.

Faith Alone Cannot Cure Fever.

A Chicago, Ill., despatch says: Menta, the daughter of Vincent B. Smith, a railroad station agent at Almira, a northwestern suburb, was prostrated with scarlet fever. Her father is a believer in faith cure treatment, and instead of calling a physician he neglected his business to strengthen his faith in Menta's recovery. When the girl died the father could not get a burial permit, and the Coroner held an inquest. The verdict censured Smith for his folly and inhumanity.

DOMINION PARLIAMENT

Sir John Thompson moved that the Weldon Extradition Bill be transferred to the Government orders.

Mr. Laurier said it was rather late in the session to ask the House to discuss so important a question as that raised in this Bill.

Sir John Macdonald said it was rather a tribute to the perceptiveness of the hon. gentlemen opposite. There was a great impatience at Canada being subject to the undesirable overflow from the United States. It was of great importance that it should be known that Canada does not desire to have additions to its population from those people who come in with their ill-gotten gains and spend them here. He thought there should be no objection to the Bill being put on the Government order paper, so that it might be discussed. When the House came to consider it they would find that it was not such an objectionable Bill, and there would be very little opposition to it. Of course, if the measure met with any serious objection it would be well to consider if it would not be well to leave it over till next session.

Mr. Laurier—My only objection is that the right hon. gentleman has been so slow to respond to that feeling of impatience.

Mr. Davies said there was no use disguising the fact that this was an extremely important Bill, which would require much discussion and examination. He understood that a similar Bill was introduced some years ago in the House, and it received some objection from the Imperial Government, and that they were indisposed to allow Canada to legislate in that way. If there was a reasonable probability of the Bill being passed he would not object, but if the Bill was merely to be introduced, it was rather late in the session. Any one who looked at the order paper could see that it was impossible to get through in less than a fortnight. If the Government were to continue introducing new Bills the session might be prolonged three or four weeks. He thought the House had before them as much as they could dispose of in the time they could be reasonably expected to stay. Strongly as he was in favor of the principle of the Bill he did not wish it to lengthen the session unduly. As far as the Bill was retroactive, he understood it would meet with considerable opposition.

Mr. Charlton said it struck him that the Bill should be transferred to the Government orders without opposition. He felt very anxious that this Bill should go through this session for the good name of the country abroad.

Mr. Mills said he introduced a Bill somewhat like this in 1872, but there was an Imperial objection to it. It had been the practice to treat the surrender of criminals as a police regulation, but the Imperial Government took the position that the treatment of persons seeking an asylum in this country should be dealt with under treaty. He would like the Government to state if the position of the Imperial Government had been changed in this respect.

Sir John Macdonald said there was a feeling among our neighbors that we were making Canada an asylum for their rogues.

Mr. Mills—Not more than they do.

Sir John Macdonald pointed out that Canada's answer to that charge was that we were willing to increase the number of extraditable offences. If there was any delay it was on the part of the United States. It was true that the Imperial Government had objected to these matters being settled between Canada and the United States, but in the proposed Bill it was expressly provided that it should only take effect upon a proclamation by the Governor-in-Council, and that proclamation would not be issued until the Government had consulted with Her Majesty's Government. The main object of the Bill being passed was to inform the people of the United States and England that Canada did not desire any such unworthy additions to her population, and was quite ready and anxious to make an enlarged extradition arrangement. The effect of the passage of the measure would also be to prevent criminals from making this place an asylum. When they knew this Act had been passed they would cease to come to Canada. For all these reasons it seemed to him that it would be well to pass the Bill. The motion was carried.

Mr. Davies asked if any railway subsidies beyond those of which notice had been given would be asked for.

Sir John Macdonald said there would be some other subsidies. The subsidies mentioned in the resolution were all revotes.

Mr. Laurier—When will the further supplementary estimates be brought down?

Mr. Foster—The present intention is to bring them down on Monday.

Mr. Jones (Halifax) asked if the statement was correct that the Government had extended the mail contract with the Allan line for another year.

Sir John Macdonald—It is correct.

On the second reading of the Bill to amend the Inland Revenue Act,

Mr. Davin moved that a clause be added to provide that the Minister might issue permits in the Northwest Territories to brewers to manufacture 4 per cent. beer. He said it was a great injustice that while the importation of this beer was allowed its manufacture should be prohibited.

The motion was lost and the Bill was read a third time.

Sir John Thompson, in moving the second reading of the Bill to amend the Copyright Act, intimated that he would offer several amendments in committee.

Mr. Davies asked if this Bill would not interfere with Imperial legislation upon the subject.

Sir John Thompson replied that no doubt it would. He maintained, however, that the British North America Act gave Canada the right to legislate in any way they deemed proper, independently of any statute previously passed. The English Act dealing with the subject had been passed in 1842. The objection if sustained would wipe away at least one-half of the revised statutes. The Privy Council had three times emphatically declared that colonial legislatures had power to repeal anterior Imperial statutes. He felt confident that Canada had power to deal with this subject, and if we had not such powers the sooner we got them the better.

The House went into committee on the Bill.

Mr. Foster moved the House again in committee to consider the resolution respecting a contract for the performance of a fast weekly steamship service for the carrying of mails between Canada and the United Kingdom, making connection with a French port.

Mr. Weldon (St. John) urged that the House should be possessed of fuller information on the subject before being asked to grant the subsidy proposed to be given to this scheme. He presented the claims of the harbor of St. John for consideration in selecting the port of departure and arrival on this side of the Atlantic.

Mr. O'Brien said that not merely the cities of Halifax and St. John and the Maritime Provinces were interested in this proposal, but the whole Dominion as well. While he was in favor of subsidizing a fast line of steamers as proposed, he thought the question should be carefully considered what kind of service would best suit the general interests of the country. He considered that a steamer which could cross the ocean in six days was something like a Pullman car—it was a luxury and could not be afforded by the general public, and it was well to pause and think whether or not a slower but cheaper service would not be more in the interest of the general public. He thought the House should have some expression of opinion from the Government, as well as in regard to the prospect of Louisburg becoming a prominent ocean port, before being asked to vote on this resolution.

Mr. Platt thought the House should first consider whether or not this subsidy should be given at all before entering into details.

Mr. Ellis thought it would be better to divide the proposed subsidy between a mail and passenger service and another service devoted exclusively to freight. He defended St. John from the charge of being subject to fogs and being in other ways undesirable as a winter port.

Mr. Foster, in reply to inquiries, said it was proposed that the vessels should be equal to the best on the Atlantic at present.

The resolution passed.

Mr. Wilson (Elgin) asked if it was the intention of the Government to introduce this session legislation to carry into effect the recommendations and suggestions contained in the report of the Dominion Labor Commission lately laid before Parliament.

Sir Hector Langevin said the intention of the Government was to read the evidence and the report during recess, and give hon. members an opportunity to do the same, so that they may be able to form an opinion as to whether or not legislation was necessary.

Mr. Bowell, in answer to the inquiry of Sir Richard Cartwright, said the total value of manufactured goods exported from Canada to Australia for the six months ended December 31st, 1888, was $41,530.

On order to go again in committee on the Bill for the prevention and suppression of combination in restraint of trade,

Mr. Mills asked the opinion of the Government as to the scope of the Bill. As he understood the measure, it did not alter the common law in the least, but simply undertook to define what acts should be unlawful in interfering with the course of trade.

Sir John Thompson said he understood the Bill to be declaratory of the common law. It would add no new penalty, and would not create any new offence, but it was believed by those who were familiar with the business methods of the country to be necessary in order to define more clearly the existing law on the subject.

Mr. Edgar denied that the Bill was declaratory of the common law. The Bill which the hon. member first introduced declared every one who entered into a conspiracy for this purpose to be guilty of a misdemeanor, but the present Bill only said that if a person conspired unlawfully he should be guilty of a misdemeanor. He objected to the proposal to reduce the period of punishment for conspiracy from seven to two years.

Mr. Davies said the Bill was a fraud, because living on the reputation of the first Bill, which it had supplanted, it was believed by the people in the country to be a measure which proposed to punish the evils it was directed against. It, however, only resembled the first Bill in the title.

Mr. Wallace said there was a fear that the provisions of the first Bill might be construed by the courts as being more severe than was intended by its framers. Judging from the actions of the merchants and producers, whom it was proposed to affect, the present measure was not a very harmless one, because they appeared in strong force before the committee to defeat it.

Mr. Mulock supported the Bill because if it did not effect very much, it would at least act as a warning, and it could be improved upon as experience suggested.

Mr. McCulla, as representing an agricultural constituency, heartily supported the Bill. Hardly a day passed in which he was not in receipt of communications urging him to assist in getting the Bill placed on the statute book. He regarded the combinations on insurance rates as one of the most dangerous of all, and instanced a case in his own town of Brampton, where, notwithstanding the organization of a complete system of fire protection, the rates remained unchanged.

Mr. Colter said the only way in which combines could be met would be by lowering the duty on the articles so controlled.

Mr. Edgar moved to make the term of imprisonment seven years instead of two.

The amendment was lost.

Mr. Wallace moved to add a clause providing that the Act should not apply to the exercise of any handicraft or labor.

The motion was carried.

The Bill was reported.

On the order for the third reading of the Extradition Bill,

Mr. Laurier inquired if it was not the intention of the Government, as was intimated by the Premier yesterday, to drop this Bill and re-introduce it next session. He thought this might be done with propriety, and without loss to any interest concerned.

Sir John Thompson said the Government had decided to go on with the Bill.

Mr. Weldon (Albert) denied that Canada was surrendering anything of value by this Bill.

Mr. Davies failed to see that the proposed Bill would provide for the surrender of those who commit frauds in financial matters.

The House went into committee on the Bill.

Mr Weldon (St. John) said provision should be made that a prisoner extradited for one offence should not be tried for another.

Mr. Davies said the whole Act was open to the objection that it might be made an engine for securing political prisoners.

Mr. Weldon (Albert) said if there was a breach of faith, power was given to the Executive to suspend the Act. It was unreasonable to suppose the Americans would be guilty of breach of faith.

Mr. Weldon (St. John) said suspending the Act was like locking the stable after the horse was stolen. He suggested that some machinery should be provided to prevent this abuse of the Act.

Mr. Weldon (Albert) said that under the treaties there was no guarantee, and we had to rely on the good faith of the countries to whom prisoners were surrendered. Any suspicion that a man was sought for one offence for the purpose of trying him for another would prevent his surrender.

Mr. Lister said that in this matter we were not dealing with the Government of the United States, but with each State of the Union, and consequently the honor of the central Government was not pledged to see that the criminals surrendered were only tried for the offence for which they were given up.

Mr. Lavergne objected to the clause which made the Act retroactive. He considered it very unfair that people who had come to this country on the strength of existing treaties, believing they would find an asylum here, should be liable to prosecution. It would affect acquired rights.

Mr. Curran said that if the law were passed in its present form there would be many cases of hardship.

Mr. Weldon (Albert) said there was no doubt that if Parliament made a good rule for the future they were doing the most important half of the work. He felt, however, that they would not be doing much if they did not besides shutting the doors drive out the flagrant offenders who were here. He denied that this Bill was making a new criminal law. It did not declare anything to be an offence which was not previously an offence.

Mr. Denison was opposed to having this Bill retroactive. These men had come here seeking asylum when they could have gone elsewhere. He agreed that for the future it was well to shut out these men.

Mr. Tisdale could call to mind people who had come to Canada thirty years ago under suspicion of crime, and had since become respectable citizens. He wanted to see the Bill passed, but did not want it framed in such a way that it should be made an engine of blackmail.

Mr. Mitchell said it would be extreme hardship to make the Bill retroactive in its operation.

Mr. Wallace said that this very clause that was attacked was the best clause in the Act. The real object was to purify this country. If this Bill passed there would be ample opportunity for these men to get out before it came into force.

Mr. Mills (Bothwell)—The hon. gentleman speaks about purifying this country. When he remembers that, according to a recent estimate, there are 188 rascals and 13 saints in this House, he will see that he has a formidable task before him.

The retroactive feature was struck out.

Mr. Weldon (Albert) moved to add a clause providing that criminals should not be surrendered, unless in the requisition for their surrender there be an undertaking by the country applying that the person so surrendered shall not be tried for an offence other than that for which he was surrendered.

The motion was adopted.

On the consideration of the schedule of offences, the following offences were struck off the proposed list: Threats by letter or otherwise with intent to extort, perjury or subornation of perjury. The following offences were added: Fraud committed by bailee, banker, agent, factor, trustee or member or public officer of any municipal corporation made criminal by law; malicious acts done with intent to injure persons in railway train, procuring miscarriage, indecent assault.

The Bill was reported, and read a third time and passed.

On the items for Welland Canal in Supply,

Mr. Somerville inquired as to the policy of the Government in regard to allowing vessels to pass through the Welland Canal on Sunday. The practice during past years of keeping the canal open had met with very general opposition from people residing along the canal, as well as from the various labor organizations and churches of the country, and he hoped the Government would determine in future on a complete cessation of traffic all along this public work.

Mr. Rykert concurred in the views of the last speaker. He hoped the Government would cancel the order keeping the canal open on Sundays. There was nothing to be gained by the practice and public feeling was strong against it.

Sir John Macdonald said this was a question of some difficulty, because while there was those who regarded a strict observance of Sunday as of first consideration, there were important commercial interests which took the opposite view. The Board of Trade of Montreal, for instance, had made strong representations in favor of keeping the canal open. The late Minister of Railways, in order as far as possible to meet the wishes of all parties, had issued an order closing the canal from 8 o'clock on Sunday morning till 9 in the evening, so that during the whole of the period of worship on Sunday the canal was closed. If the canals were closed for the whole of the twenty-four hours there would be considerable delay, and cargoes would, in some cases, be subject to charges for demurrage. Then it should not be forgotten that the Erie Canal was kept open all Sunday.

Mr. Boyle said that commercial interests should not weigh in this case, and that nothing but the necessities of life should induce the Government to allow the canal in any case to be used on Sunday.

Mr. Bain (Wentworth) urged that Sunday should be strictly observed on the canal.

Mr. Prior, on motion for supply, called attention to the circumstances connected with the seizures of British fishing vessels in Behrings Sea by the American authorities. In consequence of those seizures a number of owners of Canadian sealing vessels had been financially ruined through the confiscation of their vessels and cargoes, while the business interests in his city (Victoria) in connection with the Behring fisheries generally were materially injured. The value of the first three vessels seized with their cargoes was represented to be $153,000, and since that time eight other vessels had been seized.

Mr. Davies said the importance of this question justified its discussion even at this late period of the session. He believed that if Canada had secured the privilege of direct negotiation of commercial treaties, which had been contended for by the Opposition, all difficulty in regard to this matter would have been removed ere this.

Sir John Macdonald said that the first requisite to a settlement of the dispute in question was an admission by the United States of our claim to compensation. Without that no amount of direct representation at Washington would assist us in arriving at a settlement. Canadian vessels were not, however, the only ones that had suffered loss in Behrings Sea; American skippers had suffered in exactly the same way as the British Columbia vessels, and they had made complaints loud and long against the treatment they had received. This question was not one affecting Canadian interests alone, but the interests of every maritime nation in the world, for all were concerned in resisting the iniquitous attempt of the United States Government to make Behrings Sea a close sea. No one could, of course, foresee the result, but one thing was clear, that if the United States were resolved to insist upon their pretensions that the whole of these seas are closed to them, a grave complication would arise, and how far it might extend or to what consequences it might lead he would not presume to say. The Government were not unmindful of Canadian rights in this regard, but were persistently protesting against the wrongs which had been done to Canadian interests, for which wrongs he believed we would have to be compensated.

THAT UNHAPPY EMPRESS.

The Strange Hallucinations Which Possess Her—A Long Line of Royal Lunatics.

A Paris cable says: Empress Elizabeth of Austria, accompanied by Archduchess Marie Valerie, is at present at Wiesbaden. For some time past it has been rumored that Her Majesty is suffering from an incurable disease; but what was the nature of that disease hitherto has not been specified. Figaro now asserts that it has received the following information from sources on which the utmost reliance can be placed. It is true, says this journal, that the Empress of Austria is at Wiesbaden, but it is also true that she inhabits a villa quite outside the town, and that police agents guard all approaches to the house. This is because the unfortunate Empress is subject to the same mental malady by which her cousin, King Louis of Bavaria, was visited. She will see no one. It is not merely since the death of Archduke Rudolph that Empress Elizabeth has been affected by these symptoms. They showed themselves fourteen years ago in a craving for continual movement and various hallucinations. During the last century there have been twenty-seven cases of insanity in the Bavarian royal family. The present King is a lunatic, and several of his relatives have been attacked by the same disease. For years Her Majesty never passed a night at the royal palace in Vienna, and she used to fancy that she was pursued by the spectre of Maria Theresa. After the death of Louis II. of Bavaria the hallucinations to which the Empress is subjected have assumed one special character. She fancies that King Louis appears before her and that waters flow from his garments in such a volume as to endanger her life. She used to scream out for help and then become insensible. Her last year's stay at Corfu did Her Majesty much good. In fact, she endured only one crisis there, fancying that she was called upon to enter a convent. This idea gave way to a monomania for Heine, and she made a journey to Hambourg for the sole purpose of seeing the portrait of the poet. When the Empress learned of the death of Archduke Rudolph, a new hallucination took possession of her, that she was her son's murderer. Her Majesty's disease assumed a violent character when the court moved to Pesth. She would not see her physicians, and clothed herself in ecclesiastical vestments. She refused to take food, and her attendants were obliged to fasten her hands. At present, concludes Figaro, the acute stage of the disease has passed, leaving a notable softening of the brain. A cure is more or less hopeless.

A WIDOWER'S DEED.

He Murders His Two Children and Cuts His Own Throat.

A Winnipeg despatch says: A double murder and suicide occurred yesterday two miles north of High Bluff Station, at the farm house of Mr. William McLeod. McLeod was last seen by a neighbor about 10 o'clock on Thursday night, and yesterday one of the neighbors visited the house shortly after noon and found McLeod with his throat cut. Both of his children were found in a bed-room off the kitchen. The girl, aged 8, had been struck on the head with a sharp edged axe and was dead. The boy, aged 11, had four terrible cuts on his head and was still living, but cannot possibly recover. The theory is that McLeod first murdered his children with the axe and afterwards cut his throat. The axe was found lying beside McLeod and a knife in the cellar. Tracks of blood were found from the cellar door to where he was stretched out. Financial troubles are said to be the cause. McLeod's wife died about two years ago.

A Drunken Man's Wondrous Luck.

A Vienna despatch says: A drunken tinsmith ascended the steeple of the Franciscan Church at Warasdin, Hungary, yesterday, by means of the lightning rod and stood up on the top of the cross, which swayed under his weight. After standing there fifteen minutes haranguing the horrified crowd who gathered beneath he calmly descended as he had gone up and reached the ground unharmed.

A boy in Maine tried to kill the hired man by putting Paris green in a jug of cider. The man drank every drop in the jug with a "hah!" of satisfaction, and observed that cider seemed to be getting the old-fashioned twang back.—Detroit Free Press.

A Dollar to Spare.

The grass it is greener, the snow it is whiter,
The world is serener and life it is brighter;
The rose has a hue of a deeper carnation,
A lovelier halo envelopes creation,
And the goddess of fortune is smiling and fair
When your wallet is fat, with a dollar to spare!
O a foe to despair and death to all care
Is that sum of all blessings, a dollar to spare!

O the plethoric pocket, the big, bulging wallet,
However you mock it, whatever you call it,
Is filled with a balm, undiscovered in Gilead—
Fit theme for a bard like the author of Iliad!
O the whole world is bathed with a rose-scented air
When your wallet is fat, with a dollar to spare;
Strong to do and to dare, and a hard man to scare,
Is the man who is blest with a dollar to spare!

O age bright and sunny! O era propitious!
When the poor will have money, unless they are vicious,
Come on at a pace that is brisker and quicker,
Don't stray, like a sot that is loaded with liquor;
O list to the wail of a poor fellow's prayer,
And make all wallets fat, with a dollar to spare
Come age bright and rare, have a seat, take a chair—
Fair age when all men have a dollar to spare!

In the Rain.

I stand in the old gray weather,
In the white and silvery rain;
The great trees huddle together
And sway with the windy strain.
I dream of the purple glory
Of the roseate mountain height
Of the sweet-to-remember story
Of a distant and dear delight.

The rain keeps constantly raining,
And the sky is cold and gray,
And the wind in the trees keep complaining
That summer has passed away;
But the gray and the cold are haunted
By a beauty akin to pain—
By the sense of a something wanted
That never will come again.

A RACE WITH "COPY."

How a Live Newspaper Man Outran a Cowboy on Horseback.

One of the most interesting incidents of the opening of Oklahoma occurred upon the return to Arkansas City this afternoon of the train carrying newspaper correspondents. Seven of the Chicago and other Western correspondents had pooled their issues and engaged a cowboy to meet them on horseback just after the train entered the yards at Arkansas City and to gallop furiously to the telegraph offices. Mr. James Cox, of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, was sent out of the combination. The plan worked beautifully until the cowboy had galloped half a block on his way to the telegraph office. Then Mr. Cox saw the scheme, and leaping from the moving train he started on foot after the horseman. It was a run of more than a mile to the telegraph office. By a spurt Mr. Cox overtook the horse, and then a desperate race began. The cowboy lashed his horse vigorously, but he could not shake off the fleet-footed correspondent. On the last eighth of a mile Mr. Cox spurted like a sprinter, and by a terrific effort reached the telegraph office 40 rods ahead. When he entered the office he could hardly stand or see. His exploit was the talk of the town to-night. The cowboy has not since been seen.—Arkansas City corr. New York Herald.

The Game of Houses in May.

What the agent says: "It's very cheap at $25. The people in it will show you the house."

What the people in the house say: "Hush, let 'em ring. After a while they'll go away."

What the husband says: "Now, what's the matter with that house? You can't expect a palace on Upper John street for $25 a month!"

What the wife says: "I wouldn't live in that house if you'd give it to me!"

What the relatives say: "It isn't a good neighborhood. The house is out of repair. Plenty of better houses for same rent. Where? Oh, everywhere!"

What the large circle of friends say: "How we shall miss you!"

What the neighbors say: "That family in the fourth house in the block are moving out. Their waggon looks like an auction furniture shop. After all the airs they put on!"

What the servant girl says: "I'll be afther laving. I always go to my aunt's for a couple of weeks about the 1st of May, and then I gets a place when the house cl'aning is all done."

What the truckmen say: "—— these narrow stairs!"

What the tradesmen say: "Here's a little bill."

What the people moving out say: "He wouldn't do a thing for us, but now he's got to paint and paper the whole house before he can rent it!"

What the people moving in say: "It's the dirtiest house I ever saw!"

What the papers say: "There is more moving this year than ever before."

Strange Situation of a Robin's Nest.

In the autumn a redbreast took up his quarters in the loading end of the salle at Bullionfield Paper Mill, Invergowrie, spending most of his time in the building, and becoming exceedingly tame and familiar. During the recent spring-like weather the warbler of the woods turned up one day with a companion, and the two set about building a nest in the roof timbers. There they remain as yet, undeterred by the tumult of carts, horses and men on causeway and pavement not 20 feet beneath them.—West Lothian (Scotland) Courier

A book on church bells has recently appeared in England. Before the reformation the names on bells were commonly "Jesu," "Mary," or a saint's name. But after the time of Henry VIII. the inscription became "God Save the Queen!" "Prosperity to this parish!" and, later, the name of—the church warden!

The cliff dweller relics recently discovered in New Mexico comprise human skulls the skeleton of a child, hands, human hair etc. There are 85 pieces of pottery, from gigantic coiled vases to tiny fragments of painted earthenware. Among the relics are a number of turkey bones, and the discoverer relates that in one of the cliff houses he found the roosts of these fowls, also nests with eggshells still in them. The collection has been taken to Durango, Col.

It appears, from a British Parliamentary just return issued, that in course of the thirty years ending 1887, 2,784 suits for judicial separation were raised in the English Divorce Court, and of these 985 were successful on trial. Petitions for divorce or dissolution of marriage numbered 10,561, of which 7,321 were successful. There were 3,892 causes which did not proceed to a hearing.

In the centre of the gloomy African forest Stanley comes across the famous dwarf tribes, first described by Paul Du Chaillu. Du Chaillu reported the tiny savages to be exceedingly shy, but not actively hostile. Stanley reports them to have been the most annoying foes encountered on his whole march. It was their custom to hide behind trees and shoot at the white men with poisoned arrows; and no advances could win their friendship.

The railway statistics of the Dominion up to June 30th last year were brought down to Parliament last night. The total miles of completed railway in the Dominion at that date were 12,701. Passengers carried, 11,416,791; tons of freight carried, 17,172,759; miles run, 37,391,206; passengers killed, 20.

Lord Lansdowne continues to be exceedingly busy with the multifarious duties imposed upon him by his onerous and responsible position of Viceroy of India. The Council having concluded its labors for the time being, His Excellency left Calcutta on April 2nd, and has since visited Allahabad, Cawnpore and Lucknow. Before leaving the capital he laid the foundation stone of the volunteer headquarters, on which occasion he appears to have delivered an excellent "volunteer" speech.

M. Paulhan, a French psychologist, has performed experiments that he thinks prove that two thought-processes may go on simultaneously. Whether conclusive or not, such experiments corroborate the testimony of introspection that mental processes may take place in addition to the activity that mainly occupies the attention. These ideas in the background of consciousness are allied with the one in the centre or antagonistic to it. While a certain amount of distracting elements may be necessary to preserve the healthy flux of thought, and while in very simple operations two disparate thought-processes may be carried on successfully together, economy demands that, in the main, the ideas in the background of consciousness should be harmonious with the one in the focus of attention. The waste of energy when these ideas are of an unessential or distracting nature is a matter of common observation. A single illustration will suffice. A student is passing an examination. He is ill-prepared and nervous. The question he is answering, or the problem he is solving, occupies the focus of consciousness, but in the background are such distracting ideas as the fear of failure, the thought that there will not be time enough to answer all the questions, the query whether it were not better to omit this particular question, the self-conscious fear lest he is growing nervous, the sound of the proctor's footsteps, the scratching of a neighbor's pen, and the like. Most pupils know the waste caused by such distracting ideas. Even if by an effort of will these inharmonious elements are kept strictly in the background, still there is some loss of energy, and the effort of will demanded to repress them also takes energy.

"A Fool and His Money," etc.

Mrs. Ammon has become a pauper in Sharon, Pa. She was the mother of "Coal Oil Johnny" Steel. Oil was struck on her husband's farm along in the sixties, and her son suddenly came into possession of millions. These he soon squandered with a recklessness that became proverbial in that section of the State. He soon had nothing and had to support himself as best he could. He was killed near his old home not long ago while walking on a railway track. His mother now goes to the poorhouse, a sad example of the fickleness of fortune, when the jade is not cautiously treated.—Utica Herald.

The Daughter of Dr. Chalmers.

Helen Chalmers, the daughter of the noted Scotch divine, lives in Edinburgh in one of the lowest sections of the city. Her home consists of a few rooms in an alley. The drunkenness, poverty and suffering of men and women distress her but she is constantly with the fallen. Every night she goes out into the lanes of the city with her lantern to light her way before her, and she never returns to her quarters without one or more girls or women she has taken from the street. These people love her, and she is never molested or insulted.

Two of a Kind.

First stranger (in the far west)—Be you one of us? Second stranger (with dignity)—I do not know what you mean by "one of us." I am President of the International Aggregated Trusts to Force Up the Price of the Necessaries of Life. First stranger (genially)—Your hand, pard; I'm a train robber.

With the view of facilitating communication between a broken train and the nearest station a novel application of the telephone has been made on the railroad between Saint Valerie-sur-Somme and Caveaux (France). The stations are already connected by an overhead wire. The guard's van of the experimental train was fitted with a telephone. One pole of the battery was connected with the framework of the van, and in this way put to earth, the other pole was connected with a hooked wire, by which connection could be made with the existing line at any desired point. Upon ringing up the stations in front and behind the train receives the signal.

The Concord (N.H.) Monitor thinks that Guthrie, Oklahoma, has this advantage over Rome—that it was built in a day.

Dr. Dowling, the new pastor of one of the Albany churches, is evidently well endowed with the gift of humor. In the course of a statement of his belief which he read to his people a few evenings ago, he remarked: "I believe there are some things which cannot be answered by any theologian in the world—not even the youngest."

A TRUE STORY IN REAL LIFE.

Is Life Worth Living?

This question has been asked so often that it has been worn threadbare. Still its application is as pertinent as when it was first uttered.

At one time in my life I determined to pursue the study of medicine. Circumstances compelled me to abandon it as a profession, still I had more or less practice among personal friends, sufficient to keep up my interest in it.

One day I received a visit from an old friend, the captain of a coasting steamer. He seemed much worried, and for a time made his visit anything but pleasant. At last I said to him, "Captain, you seem troubled about something, can I aid you in any way?"

"No!" he replied shortly, "at least I don't think you can, and I have pretty good reasons for thinking so."

I felt hurt for a moment, and rather angrily replied, "Well, I don't have to."

"Of course you don't," he responded, "but it is an infernal shame, and it makes me mad all through, when I think of the way that I have been bled by a lot of frauds, that call themselves doctors."

Then he continued rapidly, "You know that boy of mine?" I nodded.

"Well, he has been a serious tax upon me for years, not that I begrudge him anything that he has cost me, but I do curse, every time I think of the hundreds of dollars, earned in the hardest manner, disappearing into the pockets of men who promised much, only to do the worst kind of damage in the end."

"Now, I have the cheerful prospect of having an undertaker's bill to pay, besides losing my boy." But, he added savagely, "I have spent the last dollar, that I ever will for medicine, and, as he has to die, the quicker the better."

"You have no right to talk in that way, Captain," said I severely. "As long as your boy lives, it is your duty to do everything in your power to aid him.'

"And haven't I?" was his response; "what is the use of your talking, you know just about as much about curing as the rest of them; although," he added, "I believe you have a conscience; the rest that I have had dealings with, don't pan out so well in that respect. I tell you," he continued, "that boy is doomed; he will go just like his mother did, and the doctors can write down in their books of failures, 'one more death from consumption, a disease we know nothing about.'"

He relapsed into a moody silence. At last I said, "Is your boy very low, Captain?"

"He can just crawl around," was his response, "and what makes the matter worse for me, is the painful way in which he asks me to do something for him. However, he will be here after awhile, and I want you as a friend of mine, to tell me to the best of your knowledge, how long you think he is going to last, so that I can make my calculations."

While he was talking, I saw the boy approaching, and just as he stepped into my office panting and gasping, from his exertion in walking, I said to myself, "The grip of death is too firmly fastened on you to be ever shaken off." After greeting him, at his father's request, I examined him and found him in the condition that I shall describe. He had evidently inherited consumption from his mother; bronchial tubes much thickened, so much so as to make the operation of breathing extremely difficult and painful. Chest cavity much contracted; auscultation and percussion showed extensive tuberculous deposits, and cavities, especially in the left lobe of the lungs; body much emaciated and bloodless. In fact, unless (to my mind) some miraculous intervention occurred to stay the progress of the disease, the patient could not survive but a few weeks. I talked as cheerfully as I could to him, but he was too much depressed to pay much attention to anything but his suffering.

The father sent him to a restaurant near by, and turning to me he asked. "Well, what is the verdict?"

I had been thinking rapidly, and as he spoke I had made up my mind to a procedure, as regards the boy, that I determined to follow out. In answer to his question, I said, "Captain, unless something is done for that boy, you will bury him within a month."

"Well, what can be done?" he said excitedly. "Do you want to try your hand in experiments? Do you want some of my money too? Are you going to sicken him to death with rotten cod liver oil, blister his skin with plasters, drug him and rush him into his coffin?"

"Hold on, Captain," I replied; "I don't want your money, but I am going to try an experiment with your permission. It is a matter of duty, and in his condition, can do no harm, if it does no good.'

"How much is it going to cost?" he asked. "I don't know," was my reply. "Whatever it is," he rejoined, "will come out of your pocket, not mine." "Don't bother yourself about that," said I coldly. When the boy returned, he seemed more exhausted than when he first entered my office, and as his father handed him a chair, he said to his son, "Del, the doctor here thinks he can do you some good. What do you say; do you want him to try?"

I shall never forget the look on the boy's face, and his words, and the heading of this article came forcibly into my mind: "Is Life Worth Living?" Evidently it was to him, as it is to all mankind, when tortured with pain, with the clammy hand of death encircling their throats, they struggle in his relentless grasp, and cry out in an agony of terror, "for God's sake, save me." I put him on a nutritious diet, eggs and milk heading the list, and provided him with a preparation of medicine, that I had never used before, or ever expected to. It was a sheer experiment on my part, as recklessly attempted as anything could be. The result—immediate improvement in breathing, and general strength of body; better color, improved spirits, increased appetite, and an increase in bodily weight that was astonishing.

At the commencement of treatment he weighed 92 lbs. In two months with constant progress to health, his weight had increased to 120 lbs. In three months he accepted a situation as an errand boy, indulged in running, boyish games of all kinds, a well boy if ever there was one. Ask him now if "Life is worth living?" "What was this wonderful preparation?" do you ask. As a matter of right you should know, and I solemnly swear to the correctness of my statement.

The boy is still in the land of the living, and well at that, and both he and his father will back my statement.

It was Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and the entire cost of treatment was just $10.

According to a truthful Southern paper a live mouse in a Texas dairy fell into a panful of milk. It swam round and round in its efforts to get out, but in vain. However, through the activity of its movements the milk was at last churned into butter, when the mouse was enabled to jump out of the pan and regain its liberty.

A GIRL TO FLIRT WITH.

For She is a Lass Whom it is Quite Safe to Love.

Vanity Fair recommends one kind of flirtation—i. e., flirtation with a view to honorable marriage. It thinks the best kind of girl is the rather heavy, good-tempered girl. She should be a little greedy—for that will mean care in the arrangement of dinner. She should be inclined to be fat—her mother's weight is always to be noticed—for then she will probably be domestic and disinclined for much gadding about. She should have a charm of a homely kind that does not attract foreigners; and there should be no sparkle, or diablerie, or any other French quality about her innocence. She should be fair, with blue eyes and a white skin that will easily freckle.

Strictly Honorable.

A story about Lady Cork, which I recently heard, relates to her energetic efforts to marry off her daughters, who it seems did not find husbands for themselves as rapidly as she wished. Lord Foley, whose intellect is supposed to be none of the brightest, was marked down as fair game, but after dining several times at the Cork's house, and being made to dance with the Cork daughters, he still gave no indication of any mad desire to take any of them to wife. As the end of the season drew near Lady Cork grew so desperate that she actually cornered the luckless lordling one day and demanded to know his intentions. Lord Foley hemmed and hawed, blushed, and finally stammered out "that they were quite honorable, as he had promised his mother on her death-bed that he would never have an intrigue with a married woman."—London Town Topics.

Her Consolation.

Bankrupt's wife—Well, at any rate, the Thompson failure was worse than ours.

Sympathizing friend—Why, I thought it was just the other way.

Bankrupt's wife—No, indeed; Edward only failed for ten cents on the dollar, while Mr. Thompson failed for fifty!

"Boat, Ahoy!

The rapids are below you!" cried a man to a pleasure party whom he descried gliding swiftly down the stream toward the foaming cataract. And we would cry "Boat, ahoy!" to the one whose life bark is being drawn into the whirlpool of consumption, for unless you use effective measures you will be wrecked in Death's foaming rapids. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery will strengthen and restore your lungs to a healthy condition, and is a sure relief for coughs and colds.

The World Moves!

Don't disgust everybody with the offensive odor from your catarrh just because some old fogy doctor, who has not discovered and will not believe that the world moves, tells you it cannot be cured. The manufacturers of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy have for many years offered, in good faith, $500 reward for a case of nasal catarrh, no matter how bad, or of how long standing, which they cannot cure. They are thoroughly responsible financially, as any one can learn by proper inquiry through druggists (who sell the medicine at only 50 cents), and they "mean business."

Proof Positive.

Tom—I am quite certain Mr. Smythe is a foreign nobleman in disguise.

Jack—How do you know?

Tom—He has such a dignified way of asking you to loan him $10.

—"The girl of the period," writes a fashion gossip, "grows sweeter and sweeter." Don't know how she can, but suppose she does.

"We believe that in extent of light-weight runs material collected and carried, Mr. Page holds the lead of any competitor and that his present stock is the largest held by any house in this country."

And the Review says:

"After a most thorough investigation of Mr Page's business as compared with others in same line, we have become fully satisfied that in a specialty, light-weight stock, he is unquestionably the largest dealer in this country, while in superiority of quality he is confessedly at the head."

QUERY: If Mr. Page's business is the largest in its line in the United States, is it not the best possible proof of his ability to pay highest prices? If he did not do so, would he naturally get more Skins than any of his competitors in the same line?

A QUEEN OF THE LAKES.

The S.S. Manitoba Launched at Owen Sound.

OWEN SOUND, May 4,—The new C.P. R. steamer Manitoba was launched here to-day. Immediately on arrival of the one o'clock train, which had two special cars of friends of the Polson Company, all preparations for the launch were completed. Thousands of spectators were on the grounds or the cliff overlooking the works.

The ceremony of naming the vessel was performed by Miss Mamie Beatty. At 1.25 p.m. the first tap of the hammer was heard knocking away the blocks. In an instant the yielding of the ways could be heard, and in thirteen minutes a ringing cheer burst from the crowd, as the enormous vessel began to move slowly and majestically towards the rippling water in the slip. Not a jar disturbed her course as she gathered speed in her onward career, and the crowd held their breath in silence as she rushed on. As she glided into the water an enormous wave rushed from each side, plenty people were almost immersed, amongst them an amateur photographer, who lost all his much-prized views. In sixteen minutes from the first tap of the hammer the ship was floating quietly on the waters, while cheer after cheer arose from the crowd and a hundred whistles saluted the beautiful ship.

The Manitoba was designed and built for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's fast line of steel steamers plying between Owen Sound and Port Arthur. The dimensions of the Manitoba are : 305 feet over all, 292 feet keel, beam 38 feet. These figures give to inexperienced minds but a faint idea of the great size of the vessel. If a person had thrown himself from the bow as she stood on the blocks ready to be launched he would have fallen about as far as from the top of a large four-story building, or about 60 feet. As one stands and looks down her saloon it appears like an enclosed street, with multitudes of doors on either side. The masts spring upwards over 100 feet, and a tall man could walk upright through the enormous smoke stack without dinging his hat. The hold of the vessel is fifteen feet deep, and when loaded she will draw twelve feet of water forward and fourteen feet six inches aft. The engine room is a mass of machinery as intricate looking as clockwork, but all tested and proved. Not only the ship's engines are here but the electric light engines, dynamos and steam steering gear, for it is steam that turns the enormous rudder. The engines are of the modern compound type and of enormous power, calculated to give the vessel a speed of 16 miles an hour. Just forward of the engine room and separated from it by an iron bulk-head is the boiler compartment. The boilers are two in number. 12 feet 6 inches from end to end and 14 feet high. The boilers are of steel nearly an inch thick and can stand enormous pressure, each one weighing 35 tons. Extending backward along the keel from the engine room is the tunnel in which the shaft revolves that turns the 12½ foot propeller. This propeller weighs six tons and has adjustable blades, four in number, bolted to the huge square hub on the end of the shaft. As one stands aft he is struck with admiration of the beautiful lines presented by the vessel. Every person who has seen her pronounces her lines finer than those of the magnificent Clyde-built steamers Athabasca and Alberta. The hold is divided into compartments by watertight steel bulk-heads, seven in number, thus adding greatly to the strength of the vessel. Both main and passenger decks are of steel, covered with Florida pine on the main deck and white pine on the upper deck. The cabin saloon is 246 feet in length, and has 64 staterooms. The contract price of the Manitoba is $200,000. She takes the place of the wrecked steamer Algoma, of the C.P.R. line, and is the largest of the line, her tonnage being 2,000 tons, while that of the others is 1 440.

Fire broke out about five o'clock Sunday morning in Mr. A. Ross' furniture factory, Owen Sound, destroying the building and contents. The property was fully insured. The building had been purchased only a short time ago by Mr. James H. Little, of The Advertiser, for a printing office, but had not yet been transferred. The loss will run over $3,000, insurance on building and stock $1,200.

THE HERALD'S DON QUIXOTE.

The articles which have lately appeared in the Dundalk Herald on "Railway Monopoly" must forcibly remind those of its readers who have read that wonderful Spanish tale, Don Quixote, of the "Battle of the Windmills." Mr. Hall sees an ogre and rushes full tilt at it with his little pen, gives it a jab and says, there, posterity will look with awe upon my achievements, for I have killed a giant. However, the giant does not die, in fact he did not feel the blow, and Don has probably ere this discovered that it was only the shadow of a little man which he was stabbing.

But to discard metaphor and deal with some of the remarks made by Mr. Hall. He says: "The statements of Messrs. Saumenig, Nixon and Morgan contained emphatic testimony in support of our assertion that the rates had been raised." The statements contained nothing of the kind. The two former informed Mr. Hall that the rates were 15½ cents, while the latter stated that they had been lowered 2½ cents. These are Mr. Hall's own words, and this is what he calls emphatic testimony! The Herald's wonderful contortions are amusing at least. Here is a sample sentence: "He (meaning The Advance) has made the wonderful (?) discovery that poles pass over two roads in going to suspension bridge. Two roads! well suppose they passed over a dozen roads, that does not alter the fact that the rates were raised, does it?" Did The Advance offer that as evidence that the rates had not been raised! No. We did not require to do that after the Herald's admission that the rate was lowered to 13½ cents! We offered it as evidence that the rates were not inordinately high when it is considered that two corporations have the handling of poles shipped on this line, and the Herald's quips and quirks will never serve to blind fair-minded readers as to the excellence of our contentions. Mr. Hall may not have the acumen to observe the ridicule he has evoked by his "battle of the windmills," but other people have. As for the Herald's disgusting attempts to turn the affair into a matter pertaining to the welfare of farmers, and shouting out with a brassy voice that "he is no friend of the farmer," we can afford to laugh at it. The Advance is probably better known among intelligent farmers than you are aware of Mr. Hall.

The whole matter can be placed in a nutshell right here. A month or so ago the C.P.R. company rearranged their rates. On certain articles of transport the price was slightly raised and on others it was lowered. This the Herald thought a grand opportunity to work off a little criticism, and made a ridiculous hue and cry over the articles that had been raised without, of course, intimating that there had been a lowering of any article. Mr. Hall should have been in a position to know the maxim that a half truth is as bad as a whole lie, but it seems he has forgotten it.

In concluding we would say that we did not fly to the defence of our "pet monopoly," as the Hearld is pleased to term it, because we feared for its safety. No person acquainted with the Herald 's reasoning powers can accuse us of anything so foolish as that. We simply wished to bring before our own readers the utter recklessness with which the Herald is run in its attempt to secure support and sympathy by setting up straw men, knocking them down again and then exultingly pointing out that Hannibal or Alexander the Great could not have done more; and we flatter ourselves that our work has been accomplished, if congratulations from many parties count for anything. Unless the Herald produces something better than the hysterical trash of last week we shall not pursue the question further.

CHILD MURDER—On Saturday afternoon after the launch, two colored women in crossing the pleasure ground found the body of a new-born female child lying in a ravine. It was wrapped in a cloth, and had never been washed or properly cared for. There were marks of violence on the face, over the nose and right eye. Dr. McCulloch made a post mortem examination of the body, and found that the child had been born alive, and that death had, apparently, been caused by a blow on the face. Coroners Cameron held an inquet on Monday, which was, after hearing the evidence, adjourned for two weeks, that further information might be gained.—[O.S. Times.

Narrate's Vision.

Time, what art Thou, with all they fleeting years?
The heart of an eternity unknown?
Thy kingdom in the future re-appears—
The spoils of nations Thou hast overthrown
Drop in the past; the wake of Thy career.
The mouldering monuments of crumbling stone
Are but Thy foot-prints, and the flying years
Are but the beating of Thy pulse alone.

The boundless universe is Thy Domains;
Thy constant hand engaged has ever been
Rolling the future in the past, where still remains
An ocean mirror in which may be seen
The wreck of ages, all Thy victory claims.
Since Eden's youthful lovers were fresh and green,
The past and future two eternities hath been;
Man's life is but a bubble in between.

We all are travellers, and the paths we tread
Join all in one; the main road to the tomb,
To swell the ranks of earth's unnumbered dead;
Onward we go amid the darksome gloom,
Like some vast river, by its countless tributaries fed,
The fate of mortals by analogy assume
The roar of unknown rapids on ahead,
Predicts the future and foretells our doom.

These are the "secret longings" and the "pleasing fears,"
The tinkling of the fetters which have bound
The soul; and through these dungeon bars no light appears,
Save now and then a transient gleam profound
From the Celestial undiscovered spheres,
Where joy unknown to mortals may abound,
Too great to measure in a world of tears;
A joy for every sorrow earth hath found.

The Triumph of Truth.

The man is thought a knave, or fool,
Or bigot, plotting crime,
Who, for the advancement of his kind,
Is wiser than his time.
For him the hemlock shall distill;
For him the ax be bared;
For him the gibbet shall be built;
For him the stake prepared.
Him shall the scorn and wrath of men
Pursue with deadly aim;
And malice, envy, spite and lies
Shall desecrate his name.
But truth shall conquer at the last,
For round and round we run;
And ever the Right comes uppermost,
And ever is Justice done.

ESTELLE'S INFATUATION:
A NOVEL.

CHAPTER III.

"YOU, ONCE MORE!"

Anthony was not the kind of man to take the world into his confidence.

Time, as he plodded on his endless way, placed a few social gravestones and opened out some new paths at Thorbergh. Among these last was the advent of the Smythe Smiths. The old family of the Massingberds, which had held the estate of Upperfold for as many generations as lie between to-day and the Third Edward, pinched between increased debts and decreased rents, found itself at last obliged to sell; and Mr. Smythe Smith was the purchaser. Of course the Blue Blood of the neighborhood resented the change, and felt disposed to make the new-comer understand its resentment. But more modern and perhaps more wise councils prevailed, and the rich merchant was adopted in the room of the ruined gentleman whom he had dispossessed, and forgiven the fact that he had never a grandfather, nor an inherited coat of arms, nor knew Greek from Hebrew nor Spanish from French, and that he could no more have constructed "Lucri bonus est odor, ex re qualibet," than could the Unfortunate Nobleman himself. He was rich, and therefore he would be an acquisition. Then Anthony Harford—undoubtedly the most considerable man of the district—knowing nothing of those hidden threads which bound their two fates together, threw the shield of his protection round the new-comer from the beginning, and the neighborhood naturally followed suit.

Naturally enough the Smythe Smiths were pained by the ingratitude, as it seemed to them, of Charlie Osborne's silence. They had been his true and valuable backers when he most needed help, and had, moreover, given him affection in excess of patronage. Mr. Smythe Smith had really liked him. And Mrs. Smythe Smith had been yet more warmly attached to him. So that when Charlie disappeared out of sight, as if he had never been born, or had gone over the rapids of Niagara—after that one visit in London on his return from Japan, fever, and his reported death, and that one brief letter from Kingshouse—the Smythe Smiths were naturally indignant, and thought no word too hard for the young man who erst had been their minor kind of Apollo or their Raffaele in patent-leather.

Lady Elizabeth, with whom the Smythe Smiths had always kept up a friendly correspondence, and who not infrequently had her to stay with them in London, knew no more than themselves what had befallen the former Eudemon of Kingshouse.

There had been more changes than one of late. That we know. Among them was a certain change in Lady Elizaberh. Something had gone from her, and something had been added to her. Her saintly quietude had gone, and in its place had come a certain practical and active vitality, as of one whose softness has been tempered by fire and whose sympathy has become consciousness.

She was standing on one low broad step which was the entrance to Upperfold, waiting for her host. The groom was holding two riding-horses for herself and Mr Smythe Smith.

She made a pretty picture as she stood there on the step, framed by the bold columns of the portico. As she stood there, more like the Delight of Anthony's first days at Kingshouse than she had been since the hour when he had all but seen her weakness and divined her secret, Anthony himself came riding through the lodge gates and up to the house, like the embodied spirit of the past—the human form of her sensations.

Before she had realized things as they were, and while she was still in that current of the past where she had been swept backward by the day, Anthony had flung himself from his horse and had her hands in his—both her hands in both of his—as in the old days when he half thought he loved her and had proposed to himself to ask her to be his wife.

For the moment Lady Elizabeth forgot all that lay between now and then—between the day when Anthony Harford was free to love where he would, and when to love him was neither shame nor sin, and this present moment when the pale spectre of Estelle stood as the sacred barrier between him and all other women on earth, when love for him was crime and his love in return dishonor. She forgot all she had suffered, all that she had subdued. This sudden reappearance of the only man she had ever loved brought back to her both the strength and the weakness of her love. It was not Estelle's husband who held her hands in his and into whose eyes she looked. It was the Love she had loved—the dream which she had once taken for truth.

"Ah!" she said, somewhat below her breath, and not knowing too well what it was she said at all, "you once more!"

"Yes, I once more," he returned, a little grimly.

He was glad to see her, this Dear Delight, who had been his as all others; but her personality was so inextricably interwoven with the memory of the greatest glory and the deepest shame, the purest joy and the blackest sorrow of his life, that he remembered what she forgot. Where with her Estelle was, as it were, swept into oblivion, with him she stood as his right hand, and through the gray eyes of this fair Delight seemed to look the dark orbs of his lost love. Then suddenly he let go her hands, and almost mechanically felt for that revolver in his pocket, which he touched as a Catholic might touch his sacred relic.

At this moment Mr. Smythe Smith came through the hall, and all significance in the meeting was at once destroyed.

CHAPTER IV.

LIKE OLD TIMES.

After that first flush and ailing weakness, when the suddenness of surprise tore aside the veil, Lady Elizabeth "held on to herself," according to the quaint Puritanical phrase. Anthony Harford was married. Failing proof positive of poor Estelle's death, he was no honest woman's love, and friendship was all that could be between one who respected herself and him. But there might be friendship. No law of God nor man forbade that! And, indeed, there was friendship—pure, sincere, unabashed, undismayed.

They saw a great deal of Anthony at Upperfold.

As yet he had said never a word of direct allusion to Estelle. That revolver in his pocket was more in his line. Once and once only he brushed by the skirts of that lost Eurydice of his—she whom the dread gods had taken, or who had sunk herself to lowest depths of Hades.

"You must come to Thirft," he said to Lady Elizabeth. "I want you to see my boy. I am sure you will see the likeness. It is so strong—there are days when I cannot look at him."

"I should like to see him very much indeed," said Lady Elizabeth, quite simply. "You know how much I loved her."

"Yes, I know," said Anthony; the talk fell there.

He could not speak of Estelle even to her—at least not yet. It would come, but not just yet; and she knew that it would come. She knew enough of human nature to be able to foresee so much. Friendship and reticence conquer the deepest reserve in the long-run; and there are times with us all when sorrow rises so high it overflows the heart and mounts perforce to the lips. Then the safe friend is trusted; and the grief that is shared by sympathy is lightened by just so much.

Things of public interest had not been wanting of late as topics for convessation. For instance, there was that marriage of Anthony's former plaything to the military-looking parson, who had formerly been curate at Kingshouse; and the escape they had had in the late earthquake on the Riviera—so soon after their marriage, too; such an uncomfortable experience! But how well they behaved! Then Lady Elizabeth received a letter from her mother which froze the blood about her heart, and flung her into the very depths of moral perplexity.

Anne had, naturally enough, written to her mother the full account of what had happened—not only the story as the press gave it, but that other even graver fact of how she met that infamous couple—those sad and fleeting forms of the modern Francesca and Paolo, for whom she had not had the great Florentine's sweet pity. She told, instead, how she had confronted these sinful outcasts, denounced them as impure, and branded them with their shame in the face of the world; how she had refused to remain under the same roof with one whose unhallowed wedding-ring, that desecrated symbol—twice desecrated—soiled the purity of her own wedding-wreath; how she had seen them cast forth like sin-laden goats, bearing the burden of their guilt with them.

It was not long after this letter that Anthony and Lady Elizabeth found themselves alone in the gardens at Upperfold. Mr. Smythe Smith had gone for the day to the nearest town; Mrs. Smythe Smith had a headache and was invisible. Lady Elizabeth had refused the offer of a solitary drive with the coachman in the dog-cart, or of a solitary ride with the groom through the lanes. She would content herself with the garden, she said, being of that sweet, unselfish kind who are so soon content. While walking there in the higher shrubbery, Anthony rode through the gate, and caught sight of her in her leafless bower, where, however, snow-drops and early celandine were springing at her feet, and the hawthorn twigs were showing red and green. He gave his horse to the groom when he learned that Mrs. Smythe Smith was not visible, and strode off to join his friend, who came down the path to meet him. She was more sorrowful and perplexed than he knew of. With that letter in her pocket, and his uncertainty of knowledge, though so sure conviction, it was difficult to know what to do—what was the right thing to do—to tell the truth and betray Estelle's sad secret, or keep silent and see Anthony's terrible wound still bleed unstanched. He was too miserable himself to-day to catch the trouble on her face. Old love had burned anew, old sorrow had wept afresh. The coming spring had touched him as it touched all other living things, and, with the nesting birds and budding foliage, came thoughts of Estelle.

They sat down on a sheltered seat under the hill and open to the south. For a moment there was deep silence between them; then suddenly Anthony spoke—looking not at Lady Elizabeth, but far out into the distance.

"If I only knew the truth!" he said. "If I did but know! Living or dead—false or only unhappy—which is it?"

"What would you do if you did know?" asked Lady Elizabeth, she, too, looking into the dim distance.

He brought his eyes back from space and fixed them on hers. He bent forward as one crouching for a spring, and laid his hand on her arm, gripping till he bruised the tender flesh as if his fingers had been made of iron.

"What would I do?" he repeated, in a low voice. He took out his revolver. "This," he said. "If false, I would kill her; if only estranged, I would woo her back to me again. But it would be this!"

Lady Elizabeth confronted him, her eyes looking as steadily into his as his into hers.

"I cannot believe you," she said, with grave rebuke. "You were not a willing murderer when I first knew you!"

"Other times other manners," he answered, with a bitter laugh. "When I first knew you I was not a disgraced husband set up for the world to ridicule. I had not loved and been betrayed. I had not a wife who had left me and her child, and hidden herself so closely away that I have never been able to find the faintest trace of her footsteps. Men are not puppets, Lady Elizabeth; least of all, such a man as I."

"But to commit murder for revenge is being worse than a puppet," she returned, steadily. "It is being the mere creature of your own passions, guided and governed by them and not by yourself."

"Not in the least," he said, in the same bitter manner. "I assure you I should take her life, if I found she had been false to me, as deliberately as I would kill a snake or any other living thing whose nature is to work woe to men. She should not have the chance to break another honest man's heart, nor wreck another honorable home!"

"You seem to forget that there is such a virtue as forgiveness," she said.

"Forgiveness is for fools," he returned. "Strong men never forgive."

"On the contrary," she answered, quickly, "it is the strong only who can forgive—who dare to be magnanimous. It is the weak who must have revenge when they are injured, because they are too weak and too vain to forgive."

"You are explicit, at all events," said Anthony, his lip lifted and his dark eye blazing.

"Because I respect you more than you respect yourself," was her reply. "Because what seems to you quite a natural and lawful thing to do, now in the moment of your anger, seems to me a dishonor against your nobler self—high treason against the real man you are."

"Sugar to coat the pill!" he said.

She laid her hand on his and looked at him with more love than she knew of shining in her clear eyes.

"No; friendship and respect shown in the very fact of daring to say unpleasant truths; belief in the real man in spite of the false appearance born of anger and distress."

She spoke from her heart, and her voice was as soft and musical as her feeling was pure and tender. But Anthony was in no mood to be witched or softened.

"And I suppose you would have me to be one of your curd-blooded crew?" he said, with a sneer. "You would have me take her back from her paramour, when he had tired of her, and reinstate her here at Thrift as its mistress and my wife? Then I would be 'magnanimous,' 'noble,' 'manly,' and all the rest of the litany which women intone for the benefit of an erring sister whom they choose to take under their protection. Thank you. That is not quite my style, Lady Elizabeth; I should not have thought it yours."

"I do not wish you to take her back to Thrift if she has left you for any one else," answered Lady Elizabeth; "but I should like you to forgive her all the same, whatever she has done, and not to harbor such dark and deadly thoughts as you do."

For all answer he took out his revolver again, and looked at it, touching it caressingly,

"This ultima ratio regum," he said, half below his breath; "and of outraged husbands too!"

"I am sorry," said Lady Elizabeth, rising. "I feel as if I had lost a friend by something worse than death."

"You have lost one by her own dishonor," was his hasty reply.

"And the other by his inhuman passion," she answered.

"So be it," he said, also rising in hot anger. "If I have to keep Lady Elizabeth Inchbold's friendship only by making a cur of myself, I must forfeit it. I am used to suffering, and prefer this with self-respect to ease and cowardice."

He met her lofty rebuke as loftily. From his own stand-point he was right and she was wrong. For a woman, perhaps, she might have something to say for herself; but for him, a man, she was decidedly wrong.

Lady Elizabeth was a saint, but she was also a woman. She held fast by her sense of good, and she was faithful in her abhorrence of evil; but the person counted for something, and she was not one to quarrel with a friend so dear as Anthony Harford. Besides, if a coolness sprang up between them, who would Estelle then have as her advocate when the time came, as it must and would, sooner or later, for Anthony to know the truth? It was her duty to keep on good terms with him for the sake of that poor ill-fated girl.

"Do not let us quarrel," she said, offering her hand, her grave eyes suspiciously full and bright. "We have been friends from the first—let us keep so to the end."

For a moment the proud man in Anthony, dressed in the brief authority of the offended, supplicated, looked coldly at this dear Delight. It was such a sweet moment—this of her offered hand and prayer for forgiveness—he could not deny its enjoyment. It was only for a moment—the very briefest; then the better self prevailed, and he took the fair woman's hand in both of his and carried it to his lips.

"Yes, we must always be friends," he said, in a moved voice. "My life would indeed be dreary without your friendship. Love and happiness left me with her—my good angel would go with you!"

"Let me be your good angel," said Lady Elizabeth, fervently. "Let me have some real influence over you!"

"Where you may," he answered, gravely. "But there are parts of a man's nature—tracts of thought and feeling—where no one ought to have influence; least of all a woman."

"I shall know when I come upon them," was her enigmatical reply; and then they talked of something else, or rather they did not for a few minutes talk of anything at all.

"She will never touch that subject again," thought Anthony, as he walked by his dear Delight's side and breathed a little deeper because he had reduced her to his will.

The Great Lesson of Life.

One day, at the investment of Vicksburg—it was on the memorable 22nd of May—during a lull in the desultory skirmishing that preceded the assault, while I was lying close to the surface of the great round globe which we inhabit and wishing I could get a little closer to it, we heard a tremendous howling and shrieking, and down the dusty road from the front came a blue-jacketed skirmisher on the trot, holding one hand up in the other, and the hand he held up had no thumb on it. It hurt like the mischief, I have no doubt, but it was only a thumb after all, and how the fellow was howling about it. He was a brave man or he wouldn't have been where he could have lost that thumb. But you would think it was the only thumb in the whole United States Army, and that no one else on the skirmish line had been hit that morning. So the soldiers saw only the funny side of the picture, and a perfect chorus of howls, in vociferous imitation of the man's own wails, went shrieking up from the sarcastic line of the men who were waiting their turn to face death. In a minute another soldier came walking back from the skirmish line. He was walking slowly and steadily, never a moan fell from his compressed lips, though they were whiter than his bronzed face, and he held his hand against his breast. The silence of the death chamber fell upon the line in an instant, as the figure of the soldier moved along the road with the air of a conqueror. Half a dozen men sprang to his side. Tenderly they laid him down in the shadow of a great oak; his lips parted to speak a message to some one a thousand miles away, and the line was short one man for the coming assault. He died of his hurt; but he died like a king. Oh, my boy! don't yell the lungs out of you over a mashed thumb, when, only three files down the lines, a soldier salutes his captain before he faces about to go to the rear with a death bullet in his breast. You can't help getting hurt. There isn't a safe place in the whole line. There are cruel people in the world who love to wound us; there are thoughtless, heedless people who don't think; there are people who don't care, and there are thick-skinned people who are not easily hurt themselves, and they think mankind is a thick-hided race; in fact the air is full of darts and arrows and singing bullets all the time, and its dangerous to be safe anywhere. But when you do get hit—as hit you certainly will be—don't "holler" any louder than you have to. Grin and bear it the best you may. There are some people so badly hurt they must moan; do you forget your own hurt in looking after them?—Burdette in the Brooklyn Eagle.

The Tall Girl in a Short Frock.

The tall girl with the short frock is out on the street again in a last year's dress, and there is no law to prevent her from appearing on the public promenade in the abbreviated skirts of the ballet dancer. The casual observer merely wonders if she has her younger sister's dress on; the careful observer notes her awkwardness, her ungainly length of limb, and hopes she is not a sufferer from a sensitive nature. She is taller than her mother, her feet are obtrusive, and every sympathizing person longs to sew a flounce of red flannel around the edge of her dress and break up that frightful monotony of length. The excuse generally offered is that the girl is very young, only 11 or 13, as the case may be, but that is no reason at all for dressing her in an outlandish fashion. If she has reached a woman's stature, keeping her in short dresses does not diminish the fact. Let her wear the pretty half-long frocks, which can be made to look as youthful or childish as her age requires. She is a melancholy object as she is now in her stilted short frocks, as if she were rehearsing for a spectacular show.—Detroit Free Press.

Dead Horse Opera House.—Third tent from the Squatter office on the west. Artistic variety performance every evening! Popular prices! All firearms must be checked with the doorkeeper. Come one, come all!

Society notes.—The accomplished Miss Lulu Grady, late of Wichita, is making a short stay with friends from St. Louis, in the red waggon in the hollow over north of the creek.

A bear strayed into Dead Horse Saturday night, and in trying to get at a barrel of pork in the tail of Judge Clocum's waggon on Arbutus street, turned over the whole outfit. The Judge got tangled up in the waggon cover and came near being smothered. Mrs. Judge Slocum had an ankle sprained. The dogs finally ran the bear out of town.

Boards have arrived for the new Swedenborgian Church on Mary Ann street. It is expected the structure will be finished Tuesday. Dead Horse is booming.—New York Tribune.

The "Reference Handibook of the Medical Science," speaking of kidney disease, says: "Often symptoms on the part of other organs, palpitation, dyspepsia, difficult breathing, headaches or weak vision first impel the patient to seek advice." The symptoms mislead both the physician and patient. The only safe method of treatment is a faithful use of Warner's Safe Cure. It not only secures healthy action of the kidneys, but cures the symptoms of disease.

At the Sunday School.

"And now, children," said the Superintendent, benignantly, "are there any questions you would like to ask before we leave this lesson?"

"How long did it take you to get all the pigs in the pen the first time you tried?" inquired the sweet little girl on the front seat.

The Highland Association of Illinois unanimously adopted a resolution condemning the New York State Senate for discourtesy shown to Hon. Oliver Mowat, Premier of Ontario.

SAFE AND SOUND.

The word "safe" is from the Latin "salvare," to save, preserve. Safe indicates freedom from harm or danger; sound, unscathed, undamaged, secure, whole, as, safe from disease.

It is likewise regarded as conferring safety, to be relied upon. Its synonyms are secure, unendangered, sure. The term is defined by lexicographers as wholesome, healthful, promoting health.

How fitting the word, as applied to Warner's Safe Remedies, which meet every requirement of both materia medica and etymology.

Their use protects from disease, and is a safeguard to the entire race.

Warner's Safe Cure has been extensively used in this and every other civilized country, and is recognized as the most beneficial remedy known to man. It has long been recognized (though not publicly) by the medical profession as the most valuable compound for the general restoration of the human system, by putting the kidneys in a healthy condition, as when these great organs are restored to a healthy action then the poisonous waste matter is expelled by the only blood-purifying organs of the system.

Few are aware that the kidneys are the only organs that purify the blood.

Fancy the danger of poisoned blood continually coursing through the body—65 gallons of blood per hour, or 48 barrels per day, passes through the kidneys, yet the unsuspecting regard them as of little importance until they are stricken down. Poisoned blood engenders general debility, pneumonia, lung and bronchial troubles, paralysis, apoplexy, heart complications, rapidly falling eye-sight, scrofulous and cancerous sores, and other serious maladies, which might be averted if the kidneys properly performed their work and expelled the poisonous, waste matter.

When the medical profession will strike at the root instead of hewing the branches, then we can hope for a happy relief from many of the ills of the present day. When diseases are called by their right names, and the real causes of death are made known, instead of death from symptoms of kidney disease, it is then that the people will become more fully aware of the terrible fatality of diseases caused by imperfect action of the kidneys.

From the Northwest.

The body of an unknown man was found in Fort Rouge this afternoon with a bullet-hole through his head and a revolver by his side. It was apparently a case of suicide.

Johnnie McLeod, the third victim of the High Bluff tragedy, died at midnight at the hospital. The remains have gone West for burial.

A man named Playfair, wanted on a charge of forgery at Lindsay, Ont., was arrested at Minnedosa to-day on the strength of a telegram from the Lindsay Chief of Police.

Gabriel Dumont was presented with an address by the Half-breeds of St. Vital on Saturday.

W. Gordon, on trial for forgery at the city Police Court to-day, obtained the criminating cheque, and, before he could be seized, chewed it up and swallowed it. He thought he was destroying the only evidence that would convict him, but as the evidence had been heard it will only make matters worse.

A troop of mounted infantry while exercising their horses yesterday afternoon about a mile from the city, discovered the body of a man in a sitting position against a tree. There was a revolver in his right hand and a bullet hole in his temple. It looked like a case of suicide, the only circumstances denoting foul play being the fact of his pockets being turned inside out. The police have been unable to discover, thus far, who the man is, but have some reason to think his name is W. Thompson.

Belle Starr's Fascination.

Despite her lack of beauty, Belle Starr, the female bandit recently killed in Indian Territory, had a wonderful power of fascination over men she cared to influence. On one occasion a wealthy cattleman whom she met at Dallas entrusted her with $2,500, and she clung to it so tenaciously that its owner never got it back again. She was arrested and convicted for breach of trust, but before sentence could be pronounced the cattleman rose in court and said: "Judge, it's all a darned lie. She ain't got a nickel of my money, and if she has she kin keep it. I wouldn't see her sent up for twice the sum." Belle was then released and rejected a proposal of marriage from the complaining witness. At the time of her death Belle was engaged in writing her autobiography for publication, in which she was to present many thrilling incidents in her wild life. She is said to have been a clever writer, employing good clear English, with a rare strength of character-drawing and accuracy.—From a Eufaula (I.T.) Letter.

THE Medical Press says there is a talk of applying telephones to the infectious wards of the French hospitals, so as to enable the sick people isolated in their contagious sufferings to have the comfort of hearing their relatives' voices without any risk of conveying infection by an interview. It certainly is a very humane idea, and would not, one would think, be a very costly one to carry out.

REV. CANON WILBERFORCE says of Ireland in the Contemporary Review: "During the last fifty years, the reign of Queen Victoria, in spite of certain ameliorations wrung with difficulty from the British Parliament, we have the horrible record, under the cold arithmetic of which lies hid an aggregate of agony indescribable: Died of famine, 1,225.000; evicted by landlords, 3,668,000; emigrated, 6,186,000; land gone out of tillage in the last twenty years, 100,000 acres; good land now waiting for reclamation, 1,500,000 acres."

SWIMMING about without any visible means of support appears to be a kind of petty misdemeanor in the Straits Settlements. A Malay was found the other night "swimming aimlessly about in the harbor at Singapore," and, as he could give no satisfactory account as to how he came in the water, he was "roped in" by the water police, and locked up. The next day he was brought before the magistrate, charged as above, but, having a good character, he was discharged, after being severely admonished, and warned not to go "swimming about aimlessly" any more.

NO SEA ROMANCER ever introduced a more novel expedient than that by which Lieut. R. M. G. Brown, of the United States warship Trenton, saved the lives of his crew. Finding that his ship was going on the reef he ordered the entire crew to mass themselves solidly in the port rigging. This made a living sail-area of 4,000 square feet, and threw a weight of 35 tons just where it was needed. Though minus both rudder and screw, the Trenton answered to this device and drew back into the bay. Lieut. Brown richly deserves recognition at the hands of Congress. His act was a stroke of genius, which only the best of discipline in his ship could carry out.

THE Chicago Tribune does not consider woman suffrage in the far west to be a success. In Utah, it points out, woman suffrage was given an extended trial, but Congress had to disfranchise the female voters because the Mormon women were completely under the control of the Church authorities and voted solidly in support of polygamy. In Kansas the female voters of the cities made no attempt to "purify politics," but as a rule voted the same way as their husbands, fathers or brothers. Where one woman voted against her husband and for the better, another took like freedom, but cast her ballot for the worse. In Leavenworth, Atchison, Wichita and Topeka the municipalities were carried for misrule by the votes of the women.

IN probably no country in the world, says an English exchange, "has the telephone come into more general use than in Sweden. Not only can Stockholm boast the most perfect telephonic arrangements of any capital, in addition to the largest per centage of telepone subscribers, but the east coast and the west coast will soon be in telephonic communication, a line between Stockholm and Gothenburg being in course of erection. Many small towns are in telephonic communication with each other, and the number of subscribers is constantly increasing. In Malmo, for instance, which has about 40,000 inhabitants, there are 600 subscribers. This town is connected with about thirty smaller towns and country places, with subscribers ranging between 200 and 10."

THE total tobacco consumption of Europe, according to the Uhlands Wochenschrift, is about 2¼ pounds to each inhabitant. In the Netherlands the proportion is a little over 7 pounds to each inhabitant; in Austria-Hungary, 3.8 pounds; in Denmark, 3.7 pounds; in Switzerland, 3.3 pounds; in Belgium, 3.2 pounds; in Germany, 3 pounds; in Norway, 2.3 pounds; in France, 2.1 pounds; in Sweden, nearly 2 pounds; in Spain, 1.7 pounds; in Great Britain and Ireland, 1.34 pounds; in Italy, 1.25 pounds, and in Russia 1.2 pounds. In the United States the proportion is said to be greater than that of any European country except Holland—4¼ pounds per inhabitant. The largest revenues derived from tobacco are obtained in France, Great Britain, Austria-Hungary, Spain and Italy.

A LEADING Philadelphia physician professes to have discovered why so many persons afflicted with bronchitis and kindred diseases of the respiratory organs are able to associate their contraction with taking a nap. This is the result of his prolonged inquiry: "I found that there was no draught; no sudden transition from heat to cold; no wet clothing; that there was not any of the usual causes, but in every instance I discovered microscopical fungi on the lounge or wherever the subject of the disease had reclined. These exist in the form of mildews, smuts and molds. They belong to the conomycetes, hyphomycetes and physomycetes, all of which bear spores. I, therefore, look upon this coincidence as attributable to the inhalation of these spores, for they must necessarily be a source of irritation to the mucous membrane which lines the air passages. There is an immunity acquired by having plenty of natural light, ventilation and dryness."

The Unassuming Toad.

Talk about blue birds and robins being harbingers of spring, the old-fashioned toad lays over them all. He is modest and unassuming, and doesn't make any pretentions to being a weather prophet, but he gets there just the same. He can't boast any brilliant plumage, and doesn't fly as high as his feathered rivals, but when it comes down to good, solid horse sense he takes the cake. When he tunes his little pipe and begins his merry-go-round of melody you can bet your winter's clothes he won't get left. This lowly child of melody knows a good thing when he sees it, and never begins operations till spring has been on hand a couple of weeks.

TOYS THAT TALK.

Wonders of Phonographic Playthings—Singing Birds, Cats and Lambs.

"The phonograph promises to afford as much recreation to children as it does interest to grown folks," so said M. P. Handy, the European manager of the great corporation which now controls the phonograph and graphophone industry, to a New York Mail reporter. "You have heard of the phonographic doll if you have not as yet seen one, but unless you have seen it you can form no idea of how naturally and charmingly it talks, laughs, cries and sings. This is the first step in a long line of phonographic toys upon which our inventors are now at work. When these are put upon the market they will create a wonderful sensation. Among them may be mentioned phonographic animals. These are toys made out of papier-mache, pasteboard, composition and other material, each and all of which are strong and durable. Each animal contains in his interior a phonograph, which, when set in motion, produces all the natural cries of the original. There is a cat that purrs, meows, spits and caterwauls in the most approved style; a horse that neighs and whinnies; a dog that barks, snaps and howls, and a sheep that bleats in a way that would deceive the mother ewe. By using a megraphonic attachment the amount of noise may be increased to almost any desired extent. Much more interesting than the phonographic animals are the phonographic birds; we have secured the melodies of the lark, the linnet, finch, robin and canary bird, and can reproduce them indefinitely. With canary birds the success is notable. We have preserved in metal the entire repertoire of a number of the finest bred and highest priced birds in the market, and by combining the songs of two or three into one whole we have an artificial canary that will outsing any natural one whatever. The phonographic orchestra and the phonographic miniature theatre are other novelties soon to be produced. In the former a band of little images, dressed up in glaring military colors, are seated on the stage as in some great concert, or stood around the drum major as on a parade. The moment the phonograph is set going each little musician moves his hands and instruments in natural style, while the cylinder inside reproduces the music of a full orchestra with startling fidelity. In the theatre we can reproduce all the spoken parts of the play. Another novelty that is half a toy and half a luxury will be the great boon to all mothers whose young children insist on being sung to before going to sleep. It is a phonograph into which a lady has sung her best songs at her leisure, and which is placed near the crib or cradle. A mere touch upon a spring starts the machinery and gives the child as much music as he or she may want. A singular feature of the phonograph is the fact that if the speed of the mechanism be increased the pitch of the voice it reproduces is heightened, and, on the other hand, if it be slowed, the pitch is lower. At the same time the character of the voice is not changed in the least. This odd peculiarity enables a man to hear how his voice would sound if he had been born a high tenor like Campanini, or the young girl if she had been born a basso profundo."

WHO MAKES FASHIONS.

An Inscrutable Mystery, but Some Guesses at its Solution.

Stepping into a millinery establishment I asked the lady in charge if she would tell me what might be the fashionable color for the season. "Garnet," she replied. "Garnet, sir, is all the go. Have you not observed it?" I meekly replied that female apparel was seldom observed by me, and I considered her word worth a month of careful examination on my part. Turning to go the woman called me to stop a moment. She had been listening at the telephone, and smilingly announced that it was well I had not left. "For," said she, "the fashion has changed. Old gold color will now have its reign." "Madam," I said, "will you tell me who orders this change?" "I am afraid I cannot gratify your curiosity, but will do my best."

Stepping to the telephone she gave orders to have the necessary inquiries made in New York. "We will see what can be done for you," was her reply. "No one in this office has the slightest idea, but we will ask in London and Paris." In about an hour the answer came, "We cannot find out; we do not know; nobody in the world knows." Laughing, the madam added, "I think, sir, that fashions come like the seasons; nobody is responsible for them, but everybody obeys. We are the trees that wear just such colored leaves as nature paints."

This was a pretty way of getting out of the difficulty. Her illustration was a charming one. The trees follow a tendency and unfold their leaves and fold them away without any exercise of reason, but they always do the right thing. October would be awkwards if she could swap places with May. You may be sure that when the time comes our mothers' scoop hats, as large as Arabs' tents, will loom upon us. Nobody will order it; they will come.—New York Press.

The Animals Suffer.

"Domestic animals in Greenland must have a hard life of it," she said. "Why so?" he asked. "Because," she explained, giving him a stony stare, "the people of that country have no doors to their houses, and when a man gets mad at his wife's cooking, or comes home and finds dinner ten minutes late, and no door to slam, he must necessarily kick the cat or dog clear across the room to relieve his feelings."

A Child's Singular Death.

DON'T NAG.

BY KATE THORN.

Whatever else you do, young wife, don't "nag" the man you have married. Burn his bread, give him pies and cake that you learned to make at the cooking school, allow his heels and his toes the inestimable privilege of free ventilation, spend his money, if you can get it to spend; but, for sweet charity's sake, don't "nag" him.

A husband is a fellow-creature. He has rights which ought to be respected. And a fault finding woman is worse than a smoking chimney in a perpetual northeast rainstorm.

The nagging woman will meet her husband in the hall and open fire on him before he gets off his overcoat.

"James, did you get that braid I sent for? No! Well, I hardly expected you would. This is the third time you have forgotten it. Why didn't I write it down? Write it down! Dear me! if I was a man, and managed a business like yours, I'd see if I couldn't remember such a little thing as ten cents' worth of braid without having it down in black and white.

"Now, James, I must speak to you about that sink pipe before I forget it. It leaks into the cellar. We shall all die of diphtheria and typhoid fever if that pipe is not attended to. I had the headache all night and it must have been the gas from that pipe. No, James, it was not the cold cabbage I ate just before going to bed. Indeed, it was not. How absurd you are!

"And there is Mary Ann so put out with the coal at the bottom of the bin that she declares she will give notice to-morrow. And dear mother just coming to make her annual visit, too!

"And the man that painted the front door was here yesterday with his bill. Such a bill! Ten dollars for painting a door! Why, I could have painted it myself for half that money.

"And oh, James, I do wish we could have stained glass in our hall, as the Joneses have got in theirs! I'm sure Jones doesn't make any more money than you do, and stained glass has such an aristocratic look. It impresses one, when one goes into a house, to meet it. Can't afford it? Well, I am not at all disappointed. I expected that was what you would say. That's what you always say when I have particularly set my heart on anything. It does seem, James, as if you sat up nights to study out how to vex and thwart me! Oh, dear! how much better off a woman is not to marry! If I had only known as much before marriage as I know now—— But there! it's no use to wish! James, if we can't have anything else like other folks, I should like for you to wipe your boots before you step into the parlor. Of course, I don't expect that you will do so, now that you know that I want you to; but I thought I would speak of it. Some men are so careless! But, then, others are not. Now, there is Mr. Roberts. He never carries in a grain of dirt, I've heard his wife say, time and again, and he puts on his slippers in the hall.

"James, the clothes-wringer handle is broken. Mary Ann declared yesterday that she'd never try to wring another rag of clothes with it. And I declare, James, you must speak to the milkman. The milk this morning was blue as the sky. Oh, dear, I wish you would put down that newspaper long enough for me to tell you about it. Reading about Harrison's new appointments, are you? Well, do let them wait. There's been too much fuss about them already. I hate politics! A man is always reading politics when his wife wants to talk to him about household matters."

And then she goes out of the room in a pet, and slams the door behind her.

Don't be like her.

WHILE IN THE BLUES.

What to Do With Letters Written During Transient Moods of Irritation.

Most women, unless they are absorbed in professional work or a favorite pursuit which takes both time and strength, desire "success in society," and none are insensible to the pleasure which many friends and numerous attentions bestow. The accident of birth and the possession of wealth give great advantages, but these possessions will not secure "success" unless tact, a desire to please and other attractive personal qualities command attention. In a "manual of good manners" Lydia E. White points out the road to social success, chiefly through illustrations and anecdote, making a book that is unusually pleasant reading and one that contains instruction. She strengthens one excellent rule in letter writing by the following story: "President Raymond, of Vassar College, was noted in his family for his moderation and homely wisdom. One day his sister, who thought she had reason to be annoyed with an acquaintance, wrote her an indignant epistle, which she sent by one of her children to her brother, that he might give her his opinion before she sent it away. The child came back directly, saying: 'Uncle John has read this, and he says as you have probably freed your mind by writing it you had better throw it into the fire.'" Good counsel that for all who write letters in transient moods of irritation and anger which will pass in reflective hours. No better advice could be contained in a book of etiquette. The people who "never write a letter and never burn one" have the most peaceful existence, while those who have a habit of transcribing their angry passions upon paper probably know the full meaning of the phrase, "in hot water."—Boston Journal.

SALTING A TENDERFOOT.

An Illustration of the Fact that Providence Works in a Mysterious Way.

A dozen years ago, when eastern tenderfoot capitalists were as thick as blackberries in the west, and every single man of them was ready to buy a silver mine before breakfast, four of us who had jumped an old claim in Nevada put up a job to catch a sucker. We went down about twelve feet with a shaft, struck "indications," and then raked and scraped for specimens to "salt" with. We sold our revolvers and everything else we could spare, and when we had the bait ready not one of us could have put up enough money to pay a week's board in advance.

We placed our figures at $20,000, and as I was the smoothest talker of the quartette I was selected as the spider to walk the fly into our parlor. I went up to Virginia City, and after a couple of days I got hold of a Boston man. He was not only green, but powerful anxious to be taken in. He was loaded down with money and overflowing with confidence. Our first conversation ran about as follows:

"Are you looking for an investment in mining property?"

"I am, sir. Have you anything in that line?"

"Yes, sir. I own a one-fourth interest in a claim which we believe to be very rich."

"One-fourth? Oh, I want the whole thing. I don't want no partners in this enterprise."

"But I think you can buy all of us out."

"That alters the case. I'll look at your claim and make you an offer."

I took him out there. I don't believe he knew the first thing about ore, but he descended the shaft, looked around a bit, and when we had hauled him up he said:

"Doesn't seem to be overly rich, but I'll chance it. I'll give you $16,000 cash for your right, title and interest."

We closed on that, transferred our rights, and almost broke our necks to get out of the country before any climax came. The old chap was the butt of ridicule for several weeks, but people then began to laugh the other way. He got men and machinery to work, sunk three or four shafts, and inside of a year he took over $100,000 worth of ore out of that claim. Inside of three years he took out half a million, and then sold to a syndicate for double that sum. I met him after he had drawn $200,000 in Denver, and he held out his hand and said:

"Why, my dear man, I'm glad to see you. Have often wondered where you went to. It was a pity you poor fellows were obliged to sell out so cheap. Here, take a couple of hundred to get a clean shave and a new suit of clothes!"—New York Sun.

SIR BOYLE ROCHE.

Something About the High Priest of Irish "Bulls."

A writer in the London Spectator says: Perhaps a few particulars about Sir Boyle Roche, the hight priest of Irish "bulls," might be interesting to your readers. He was of the ancient family of the De La Russes, of Fermoy, was member for Tralee from 1775, and was created a baronet in 1782. He began one of his speeches in the Irish House of Commons as follows: "Mr. Speaker, it is the duty of every true lover of his country to give his last guinea to save the remainder of his fortunes." And another began: "Sir, single misfortunes never come alone, and the greatest of all national calamities is generally followed by one much greater." A letter of his is still preserved, supposed to have been written during the rebellion of '98, though it is doubtful if he ever put so many "bulls" together on paper. It is as follows:

"Dear Sir—Having now a little peace and quiet, I sit down to inform you of the bustle and confusion we are in from the bloodthirsty rebels, many of whom are now, thank God, killed and dispersed. We are in a pretty mess, can get nothing to eat, and no wine to drink except whiskey. When we sit down to dinner we are obliged to keep both bands armed. While I write this I have my sword in one hand and my pistol in the other. I concluded from the beginning that this would be the end, and I am right, for it is not half over yet. At present there are such goings on that everything is at a standstill. I should have answered your letter a fortnight ago, but I only received it this morning. Indeed, hardly a mail arrives safe without being robbed. No longer ago than yesterday the mail-coach from Dublin was robbed near this town; the bags had been very judiciously left behind, and by great good luck there was nobody in the coach but two outside passengers who had nothing for the thieves to take. Last Thursday an alarm was given that a gang of rebels in full retreat from Drogheda were advancing under the French standard, but they had no colors nor any drums except bagpipes. Immediately every man in the place, including women and children, ran out to meet them. We soon found our force a great deal too little, and were far too near to think of retreating. Death was in every face, and to it we went. By the time half our party were killed, we began to be all alive. Fortunately the rebels had no guns, except pistols, cutlasses and pikes, and we had plenty of muskets and ammunition. We put them all to the sword, not a soul of them escaped, except some that were drowned in an adjoining bog. In fact, in a short time nothing was heard but silence. Their uniforms were all different, chiefly green. After the action was over we went to rummage their camp. All we found was a few pikes without heads, a parcel of empty bottles filled with water, and a bundle of blank French commissions filled up with Irish names. Troops are now stationed round, which exactly squares with my ideas of security. Adieu! I have only time to add that I am yours in great haste.

B. R.

"P. S.—If you do not receive this, of course, it must have miscarried; therefore I beg you to write and let me know."

What is Happening in Our Own Vicinity.

Fishermen from Toronto and other places have been numerous.

Every thing in the Medical line at Medical Hall.

The cheese factory opened on Monday last with a large number of patrons.

Some of the boys are "camping on the old tent ground" at Feversham this week.

Wall paper, the largest assortment and cheapest at Medical Hall.

There are twelve more recruits wanted for the Flesherton company of volunteers. See adv.

Mrs. Baskerville, of Manitoulin Island, is visiting with her daughter, Mrs. W. Trimble.

Messrs. M. Richardson & Co. have purchased the bankrupt stock of J.G. Anderson at 64 cents on the dollar.

A large assortment of turnip and carrot seed, at Medical Hall.

The renowned elocutionist, Mr T. C. Watson, died in New York the other day. We believe he was well known to people in this vicinity.

Fine bamboo fishing poles, from ten cents up; fish hooks, lines, and all fishermens requisites at W. Richardson's drug store.

We were slightly astray in saying that the brick work of Mr. Stinson's residence was nearly completed. We should have said the stone work.

Mr. T. Hollinger caught 21 dozen speckled trout on Wednesday of last week. Tommy is the fishermen par excellence of this burg.

A fresh lot of asbestine, in a variety of tints, at Medical Hall.

Mr. Paton's magnificent heavy draught stallion, "Baron," visits Flesherton every Friday. He was the prize winner at East Grey spring show last year.

House and lot for sale in the village of Flesherton. Apply to Robert Fawcett, senior.

Every individual interested in gardening or fruit raising should take the Canadian Horticulturist. The May number is especially fine. Can be examined at this office.

J. C. Griffiths, esq., one time partner with Mr. Damude in Flesherton, has removed from Owen Sound to Walkerton, where he will open up a first class harness shop.

There will be horse races in Shelburne on May 24, when the C.P.R. will issue return tickets at single fare. We beg to thank the Turf Association for a neat badge for the occasion.

The school bell has for a long time been suffering from biliousness, or some other disagreeable disease, but has at last recovered and its merry ding dong dings once more with a hearty ding.

Markdale will celebrate the 24th with athletic sports and games, fire works, tug of war, and a Calithumpian procession. Games to commence at 1 o'clock. A very large list of prizes for sports is offered.

Messrs. M. Richardson & Co. have purchased the bankrupt stock of J. G. Anderson at 64 cents on the dollar, and will now be in a position to offer the purchasing public such bargains as they seldom hear of.

The answer to our riddle of last week is "Rooster." Several answers have been received, such as "wood-pecker," "parrot," etc. The writer desired the name "Chanticleer" to be given as the correct answer.

Just received! A fine case of Long Clear Boneless Bacon, spiced rolled bacon, farmers cured bacon, farmers cured hams, and smoked hams, selling off very fast for cash, or eggs taken in exchange. Petch & Mitchell.

Shiloh's catarrh remedy--a positive cure for catarrh, diphtheria and canker-mouth. For sale at the Medical Hall.

Mr. and Mrs. Isaac Spiker, of Manitoba, were visiting during the past week with their son-in-law, Mr. W. P. Crossley. They were en route for Dakota, where they intend to reside.

The Teachers' Association of East Grey will meet in Flesherton two weeks from to-day, May 30 and 31. Residents willing to give accommodation to the visitors would confer a favor by informing Mr. Irwin, secretary, Principal of Flesherton school.

The concert to be held on the evening of May 24, under the auspices of the Presbyterian Ladies' Aid will take place in the Town Hall, not in the church as announced last week. The program will be a good one. Admission 15 cents.

Mr. T. Gamey, jr., who is at present with Mr. Thos. Bates at the American Sault, called upon us last week. He was down for the purpose of removing his family to their new home. Mr. Gamey pronounces the business done by friend Bates as something phenomenal.

The hot summer is here. It was terribly hot last week, but it will be hotter still for some very delinquent subscribers some of these days if they don't "whack up." Please attend to your labels at once so that you may be enabled to keep cool during the dog days.

Mr. Johnston Little, of Flesherton Station, is selling the Clokey's Patent Center-Cut mower. Farmers desiring a mower would do well to examine this machine before purchasing, as it is the best on the market. Simplest, highest draught, easiest riding and does better work than any other machine.

A despatch to the daily papers from Hespeler, Waterloo County, says that a certain gentleman captured a speckled trout measuring fifteen inches and weighing about two pounds, "the largest caught in the county of Waterloo for many years." Huh! The people of Waterloo may blow about their minnows. We catch three and four pounders here and don't have to use electricity to let the world know it. See our trout item elsewhere.

A guide to fishing and hunting resorts, published by the G.T.R. Co., has been received. Its accurracy may be judged by the information it gives concerning Kimberley. The Guide says boats may be hired there for 20 cents an hour or $1 per day. It will cost a man who finds a boat at Kimberley about $30 for the first hour, for he will require to have it built for the occasion.

Why will you cough when Shiloh's cure will give immediate relief. Price 10 cts., 50 cts., and $1. For sale at the Medical Hall.

Flesherton P.O. Hours

Office hours from 8 a.m. till 7 p.m. On holidays the office will be open from 9 till 9.30 a.m., and 1 till 2 p.m.

Garden Party.

A grand garden party will be held on the lawn of the Methodist parsonage, Maxwell, on Thursday, June 6. Flesherton Brass Band will be present all afternoon. See large bills for particulars.

Church Parade.

There will be a church parade of the Flesherton company of volunteers on Sunday evening next to the Methodist Church, when Rev. Mr. Shilton will preach an appropriate sermon.

24th Celebration.

Queen's Birthday, May 24, will be celebrated at Maxwell this year with games, races, calithumpian procession, etc. See large bills for list of prizes offered.

Big Fish.

The Advance can supplement its fish item of last week with a more mature one this week, and also from Priceville. Mr. Geo. Tyron, butcher, caught a speckled trout there which measured 22 inches in length and weighed 3 lbs. 2 oz. We rather calculate this mounts the pinnacle for the season of 1889. For genuine fish tails Priceville is away ahead of any place we ever knew.

A Quick Return.

Mr. J. Plewis, late of Kimberley, left for Washington Territory with his family about three weeks ago. On Saturday last he returned with disgust marked in every lineament of his features. He says there is more civilization in Flesherton in one day than can be found in Washington Territory in a year. As for bringing up a family of young folks in that benighted region he would rather be excused. Mr. Plewis and family are again living at Kimberley in the house which they sold before going away.

Barn Burned.

The large frame barn belonging to Duncan McMullin, Proton, was destroyed by fire on Tuesday, together with considearble grain and one horse. Loss not known.

Get Married.

Every newly married couple may have The Advance as a wedding present free for six months, upon funishing satisfactory evidence of the marriage. This is a standing offer and application must be made six months from date of marriage.

A Good Joke.

One of the best jokes of the season was that perpetrated by a horse on three young doctors who went fishing last Thursday. They drove to the fishing grounds, unhitched the horse and placed him in an unused stable. In the evening when three tired young men arrived at the stable to hitch up they discovered that the horse had disappeared, leaving the buggy behind. It is said the anathemas hurled at that poor beast would have broken the spirit of any ordinary animal, but the runaway was serenely unconscious of it all and arrived home a long time ahead of the three straggling pedestrians who came staggering into town after dark. A horse that is worth hitching is worth hitching well.

To Maxwell.

The Advance took a drive to Maxwell on Friday last, and found that little town quiet, but the inhabitants contented and happy. We did not have sufficient time at our disposal to become acquainted with all the business men there, for (must we tell it) there was good fishing by the way, and they bit well. Three dozen was the catch for two hours. We just saw sufficient of Maxwell people to cause a desire to learn more about them, which we intend to do ere long. Vegetation has made the road to Maxwell one of the most pleasant drives in this vicinity. Fruit trees are in bloom, and in some places the wild plum trees form huge bouquets of snowy white. Again beautiful evergreens grow in great profusion along the roadside, forming an exceedingly pleasant contrast to the flowering trees, and appear cool and inviting during the hot days. Mr. Parks, of the Feversham stage, drives over this road daily, and it would repay travellers to take the trip and enjoy a pleasant bit of scenery.

Special Announcement.

We have made arrangements with Dr. B. J. Kendal Co., publishers of "A Treatise of the Horse and his Diseases" which will enable all our subscribers to obtain a copy of the valuable work free by sending their address (enclosing a two-cent stamp for mailing same) to Dr. B.J. Kendall Co., Enosburgh Falls, Vt. This book is now recognized as standard authority upon all diseases of the horse, as its phenomenal sale attests, over four million copies have been sold in the past ten years, a sale never before reached by any publication in the same period of time. We feel confident that our patrons will appreciate the work, and be glad to avail themselves of this opportunity of obtaining a valuable book.

It is necessary that you mention this paper in sending for the "Treatise." This offer will remain open for only a short time.

Taffy—yum yum.

The Advance attended a taffy party at Kimberley on Monday evening. It is rather late in the season for a taffy party, but the enterprising and affable miller of Kimberley town, Mr. Bishop, late of the province of Quebec, had imported a large amount of the concentrated essence of maple, and thinking that the most speedy way of getting rid of his importation was to give a taffy party, the scheme was carried to a successful issue. The affair was given at the Temperance House, and attracted a large number of invited guests. Taffy was ladled out ad libitum, games, music, etc., were indulged in, and a particularly sweet time experinced by the boys and girls. There were fully fifty people present, and every one of the fifty went home satisfied that Mr. Bishop was a good hearted soul, and thankful to the Temperance House people for the entertainment provided. The Advance never was at a taffy party before—always considered ourselves sweet enough, but have changed our mind, and if the next individual who springs a taffy feed does not invite us he will think a sprig of wormwood dropped into his saucer.

CORRESPONDENCE.

School Matters.

MR. EDITOR,—Your "Flesherton Station" correspondent still persists that there were and are fifty bonafide resident children in the station section. The assessor under oath declares there are not? Which is to be believed?

The Government takes the census of the assessor as a basis for the distributions of the school monies to the townships annually. It is clear, therefore that if this section be reported one hundred per cent. less than the number in it, a grave injustice is done to other sections. But almost personal knowledge leads me to assert that the assessor's report is correct or approximately so. A mere ipse dixit weighs nothing at all as testimony, in face of official facts and figures. It is not pleasant to expose a matter that is settled for the time being, and, but for the bold assertions of your correspondent, against facts and reason, nothing would be attempted. Children were given that were not residents according to statute; some were over age, whilst others were under. Some, it is said, were imported for the occasion. The mere assertions of teachers were taken, no oaths were administered. It was plain sailing and the thing was done, and no body feels bad about it but themselves. But your facile correspondent will always fail if he attempts to convince by erroneous statements. The school population in said section stands higher for 1889 than for any previous year—27 is the number now reported—there is therefore some hopes for the future. The average attendance for 1888, including outsiders was 21. Certainly it denotes a very healthy state for its interest in educational work. TYRONE.

To The Editor of The Advance.

DEAR SIR,—In looking over your issue of the 9th I was sorry to find that Mr. W. J. Blakeston has taken offence, by misunderstanding certain passing jokes between "Oben" and myself. Who Oben is I do not know, but as he, like myself, was an Advance correspondent, I felt more free in joking with him (and I hope to hear from him again.) I never intended any "slur" upon the "teacher," much less upon the "pupils," of "Hillside Academy," nor even referred to either of them. As Oben had been criticising (good naturedly) my "English," I merely gave him a brush back again, by suggesting a term in the school with such a high sounding title, as a cure for my errors.

If the ironical praise lavished on a certain portion of a program, rendered at a late entertainment, is what sticks in Mr. B's gizzard, then I have no remedy for him. Although I do not know who the committee of management were, or under whose direction said entertainment was gotten up, yet I say that certain portions of the program, as reported by Oben, were liable to criticism, and in fact would not be tolerated in many school sections in this country.

My limited acquaintance with Mr. P. did not result in any "grudge" or ill will whatever, and he is an efficient teacher for aught I know, but I think that the Professor of "Hillside" should show his education and good breeding by withholding his pet "Anglo-Saxon four-lettered word" (which sounds so very bad coming from professional lips) until he received the explanation that he requested.

Hoping that the explanation here offered will satisfy all parties concerned, and thanking you, Mr. Editor, for the space occupied, I remain your poor correspondent who innocently ran into a hornet's nest.

Priceville, May 13, 1889.

Priceville.

From our own Correspondent.

Very fine dry weather.

Trout fishing is all the rage just now, last week Mr. W. Conkey hauled in a trout weighing 1 lb. 14 oz. but the next half hour Mr. Geo. Tryon captured one that turned the scale at 3 lb. 2 oz. Rather difficult to beat ain't it. Several others also caught specimens weighing from one to two pounds.

Last Sunday evening two or three South line young men, on their way home, threw a stone and broke the window glass in Mr. Robt. Reid's house, on the Durham Road. One of the rowdies returned next day and tried to settle the affair, making the excuse that he was drunk. Perhaps if our License Inspector would wake up, he might find out where intoxicating liquor was dispensed on Sunday.

Mrs. Robertson, a lady of advanced years, after an illness of two or three weeks duration, passed away on Sunday. The funeral took place on Tuesday. She was the mother of the Conkey brothers.

Balsam Valley Items.

From our own Correspondent.

Since I last wrote there has been some very unfavorable weather for the thrifty farmer who had nearly all his land plowed last fall, fully expecting in his own mind to rush in his crop and complete seeding in a few days, but alas! his expectations were nipped in the bud, as the grain he had sown was nipped in the sprout, by the appearance of the frost king, who noiselessly swept down upon Balsam Valley with flying colors and attacked quiet, harmless vegetation, with such zeal and energy as threatened to completely annihilate it, but it stood the onslaught of its formidable enemy admirably well. Fine weather set in after Mr. Frost's departure, and the farmers brought out their grain and implements and the dust began to fly again.

Mr. Dan McIntyre finished seeding before anybody else in this neighborhood, and then he commenced plowing up little town lots in Priceville. I don't know whether he is plowing by the square yard or foot.

The late fighting scrape has been amicably settled by the defendants paying all costs, amounting to $7 50.

Sunday-school commenced on May 6th as agreed upon. It is not supported by any particular church, and they are going to take up collection next Sunday. Bring on your quarters. All are welcome. There was a very good attendance the first day. It is a very good thing.

A number of our athletic young men meet twice a week for the purpose of practising running, jumping and vaulting. As far as I can learn they are improving fast. That is right boys, go out on the 24th and show your action.

Any one who read Priceville cor's. effusion two weeks ago could see without the aid of a magnifying pair of specs that he was "real mad." So mad he was under the conviction that he was found out, that it filled his soul with a malicious desire to do Oben up. In order to accomplish this he got his gun and his spy glass he knew that to get a personal drive at Oben was like cooking a rabbit, he would have to catch him first, and he struck straight for Swinton Park. In his blind rage he passed Oben in Balsam Valley and lost his gun shortly afterwards, but hung on to his glass until he collided with Hillside Academy, and smash went the glass! When he recovered sufficiently he staggered up to the platform and made a very awkward attempt at a Highland fling to the tune of Rob Roy McGregor, you remember the one he thought the wild geese were playing much to the amusement of the little children who occupied the front seats and could have taught him a lesson. When through he took a seat near the door, for one of the big boys looked cross at him. The next thing on the program was a speech by Mr Bushwhacker, who did not hesitate to denounce P. cor's attack on Hillside Academy, that grand institution where our children receive their first lessons in art and science.

You are digging in the wrong hole for the fox this time, P. cor. You went so far as to intrude into the private matters of a school in Proton which you had no business to do, and made a personal attack upon the teacher, of course you thought he was Oben! Now you want to be careful or the first thing you know Bushwhacker will be at you. Oh, yes, do come out to Balsam Valley this summer and go to school along with our little children. No doubt they would laugh at you a little when you would be made to stand on the fance stool, but you would get used to that and you would derive a great deal of benefit intellectually, a thing which you stand greatly in need of. And perhaps you might learn to play on some or those ancient instruments which you love so much.

Mr W. J. Blakeston has at last fulfilled his threat to send a card to the Editor to clear himself of the blame of writing from here and now he wishes he had not, for they blame him still. He gave P. cor. quite a riddling in last week's issue for his impertinence. When I read it I began to sing "Reinforcements now appearing, victory is nigh." It would be good policy for P. cor. to write out an humble apology to Mr. Blakeston as soon as possible, but I suppose any advice from me to that individual would be like castor oil—easy to give, but very hard to take. I pity P. cor in his extreme lack of judgement. He must have felt mean when he found out he was sold.

Mr. Neil Cameron has had very poor health this spring. Mr. J. McQuinn also has been laid up with rheumatic pains, consequently he is considerably behind time with his work. He is going to erect a large frame barn this summer with stone foundation, and he is ill prepared for such hard work as accompanies such an undertaking.

Mr. J. Olcorn let his young cattle out on the road before the grass was very good and they strayed away. We do not know if he has found them yet.

Mr. R. Black was visiting friends here last week.

Mr. M. Beck was up on a short visit at his old friend's, M. Frook's. He had the misfortune to get one of his legs broken since he was here last. He is getting better fast considering the nature of the break.

There is a rumor going the rounds that Mr. W. Sackett has joined the army of benedicts. I will not say anything more about it until I find out if it is true.

Miss Mary McCormic is working at J. Campbell's.

Mr W. J. and S. Blakeston have purchased a tongue, whiffletrees and neckyoke for their covered buggy, and now they drive around with their colts and crack their whips in grand order. They are the stuff.

Miss Annette Nicholson went home on a visit. We expect her back again after a while.

Who is going to send in the next card?

Say, Z. Ag Bradshaw, write another letter soon and tell me what to call P. cor. Maybe that fellow you shot on the nose with a pen could think of a good name. OBEN.

Another Institute Formed.

A public meeting convened by trustees of No 3 S.S., township of Melancthon, county of Dufferin, was held in the school house on Tuesday evening, May 7th, when a Farmers' and Mechanics' Institute for said school section was successfully organized with Robert Little president, Robinson Postill and Joseph Thompson vice president. R. J. McGhee, secretary, Vickers Bates, treasurer.

An executive council of twelve and other officers were also duly elected.

Among other business transacted this institute in session respectfully requests the Farmers' and Mechanics' Institute of Horning's Mills in addition to having resolved upon holding monthly cattle, horse and sheep selling fairs to further resolve at its next meeting on Saturday evening, May 18th, so as also to establish a weekly market day in Horning's mills for cash sales and purchases of butter, cheese, eggs, poultry, fruit, vegetables, hay, grain and general produce. Also recommends that the monthly cattle cattle fair and weekly market day be commenced on same day and both continue to be held under the auspices of president Jarvis and other officers of Horning's Mills Institute, so as to become a pattern of material and moral standing for imitation of all concerned at surrounding railway produce buying stations.

That this Institute believing that substantial benefits must result from properly organizing Farmers' and Mechanics' Institutes through which to co-operate with other institutions to successfully establish the British principle of public markets at grain buying stations and market places throughout Canada, therefore recommends farmers and citizens generally to unite in holding public meetings in villages, towns and townships and to act together in petitions.

That this Institute thanks the Flesherton Advance and other journals for publishing reports of Farmers' Councils and Institute meetings.

PARNELL ON THE STAND.

Mr. Parnell Cross-Examined by the Attorney-General.

A last (Wednesday) night's London cable says: Mr. Parnell, on cross-examination, denied that the Irish World ever collected moneys for the Parliamentary party. The Irish World had been hostile to himself and the Parliamentary party since 1882. Attorney-General Webster produced extracts from the Irish World praising Mr. Parnell's action in Parliament after 1882.

Sir Charles Russell, counsel for the Parnellites, put in extracts adverse to Mr. Parnell.

The cross-examination was then continued. Mr. Parnell admitted knowing Mooney, otherwise known as "Transatlantic." He did not know whether Mooney contributed to the Parliamentary fund. Mooney wrote violent articles, still witness would not object to receiving Mooney's tribute to assist the party if he did not publish articles advocating murder. Witness had held no communication with Patrick Ford since 1881. Mr. Parnell emphatically denied that the Irish schemes ever included a coalition with the Fenans, in order to expel landlords from Ireland. He certainly aimed to destroy landlordism, but not to drive individuals from the country, and never had any idea of resorting to illegal means. He did not recollect meeting Mr. Davitt and John O'Leary in 1878 and discussing with them a possible alliance between the Nationalists and the Fenians. He had no notion that the National fund in America and the skirmishing fund were identical.

Attorney-General Webster read a violent manifesto signed by John Devoy and others and issued at Dublin. Mr. Parnell declared he had never heard of it before. He had met Devoy, Breslin, Finerty and Alexander Sullivan and a number of physical force men. He said he would frankly avow that he felt it was no part of his duty to exclude anybody from the League on account of their antecedents. He wanted to include in it all Irishmen, trusting that every section would accept the new constitutional form of agitation. He had aimed at asking the physical force men to abandon their movement and to accept his. To shut the constitutional door in their faces because they did not immediately agree would have been very foolish. He did not recollect making a speech at Lynn, Mass., in which it was alleged he had said that when England was beaten to her knees the time would have come to realize the idea of the Nationalists. He admitted that if he had used those words he must have been thinking of methods of warfare in the event of constitutional agitation failing. At Troy somebody offered him $5 for bread and $20 for lead. He did not object to the offer, because he thought the offerer only meant $5 for charitable work and $20 for League work. This statement caused laughter.

The Commission at this point adjourned.

A last (Friday) night's London cable says: Mr. Parnell denied before the Commission that he knew "Number one" under the name of Tynan or any other name, and said he had never heard of Mr. Egan being associated with "The Martyrs' Fund," for the benefit of the families of the Phœnix Park murderers. He saw nothing criminal in the fund and rather thought it was right to assist the innocent victims. "The Martyrs' Fund" might not, however, have been the most appropriate name for such a fund. He could not, he said, recollect denouncing outrages between 1878 and 1881. He believed the outrages perpetrated to have been the work of small secret societies. Witness was then asked whether if secret societies adverse to the League had existed, and if a vast majority of the people had belonged to the League, there would not have been ample evidence obtained to convict the perpetrators of outrages, but he parried the question, saying that that might or might not have been the case.

Then occurred the most remarkable incident in the witness' cross-examination. Attorney-General Webster quoted a statement made by Parnell in the House of Commons during the debate on Mr. Forster's Bill in 1881, suspending the writ of habeas corpus, to the effect that secret societies had then ceased to exist in Ireland.

"Did you believe that when you said it?" asked the Attorney-General.

"No," replied Mr. Parnell. "At any rate it was a grossly exaggerated statement." There was a buzz of surprise throughout the court room at this response.

"Did you or did you not," continued the Attorney-General, "intend to misstate the fact when you made that statement?"

"I have no doubt I did," was the reply.

The Attorney-General—Deliberately?

Mr. Parnell—Yes. Deliberately.

The Attorney-General—You deliberately made the statement, knowing it to be untrue.

Mr. Parnell—Yes; or if not untrue, very extravagant and boastful.

The Attorney-General—And you have never since withdrawn it?

Mr. Parnell—No, I have not.

The nonchalance with which the witness made these admissions astonished the audience and elicited hisses.

"Probably," added Mr. Parnell, "the statement was meant to mislead the House. I am afraid it did not, for the Bill was passed. My purpose was to exaggerate the effect the League had in reducing the number of secret societies. The League undoubtedly diminished the number of secret societies, though it had not swept them away, as I stated."

Mr. Parnell was next asked what had become of the Land League's books. He explained that some were brought to London and were before the Commission. The cash books and ledgers had disappeared, he did not know where. Neither was Treasurer Kenny, Mr. Egan, nor any other of the League officials able to tell what had become of them. The letter books and files of letters had also vanished.

Presiding Justice Hannen here impressed upon the witness the fact that the Court attached great importance to the missing documents, and Mr. Parnell promised to try and find them.

THEIR WANDERINGS ABROAD.

American Pilgrims in the Holy Land—They Visit Jerusalem.

A London cable says: The following despatch has just been received regarding the movements of the American pilgrims. It is dated Jerusalem, April 21st, and says: We left Cairo on April 4th by special train for Ismailia, where the following morning we took a steamer on the Suez Canal to Port Said. Thence the Egyptian mail steamer conveyed us to Jaffa, where we landed on Saturday morning, April 6th. On the afternoon of the same day we left in carriages and travelled to Ramleh, where we stopped for the night at the Franciscan hospice. On the morning of Sunday our journey was resumed, and at 4 o'clock of the same afternoon our party entered Jerusalem. We dismounted outside the city, opposite Howard's hotel, where we were met by the American consul and large crowds, who had come out to see the first American pilgrims. The reception was very enthusiastic. The American flag, which had been brought by Misses McCartens from New York, led the way. The pilgrims occupied the central position. The psalms "Lætatus sum laudate domum omnes," Gent's Benedictus, and the hymn "Ave Maria Stella," with the Magnificat, were sung as we marched through the Jaffa gate, the principal entrance to the city, up to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre.

After veneration at the tomb of our Divine Redeemer, we proceeded to Casa Nova, the hospitium of the Franciscans of Jerusalem, where our quarters were assigned.

The respect shown to the members of the American pilgrimage by the Turkish soldiers was quite marked. The visa on our passports by the Turkish Consul in New York appears to be of no value, as an order from the American Consul, warning us of the necessity of procuring a regular Turkish passport if we wished to proceed to Beyrout, cost all the members of the second and third sections the handsome sum of seven and a half francs, in addition to the sum of five francs which were paid to the Turkish Consul before we left New York. Of the seven and a half francs paid here, five go to the American Consul. Not once have we been asked for the passport, American or Turkish, since we left Hoboken. The visa of the Turkish Consul at home was said to be good for Alexandria, Jerusalem, and Constantinople. Naturally there was some indignant feeling over the matter, and the conclusion naturally reached was that the passport is a very ornamental but very dear and useless piece of paper, as the majority of the pilgrims procured the American passports through agents and paid $5. It is safe to say that our American pilgrimage paid over $600 for passports alone. When we get to Beyrout, we shall see what necessity there is for the pass.

All the sacred places in and around Jerusalem have been visited, and the majority have made the trip to the Jordan and the Red Sea. The very impressive ceremonies of Holy Week, recording the events of 1,900 years ago on the very spots where they occurred, were well attended.

The wild, and I might add disgraceful, exhibitions of superstitious fanaticism of the Greeks, in the reception of the so-called holy fire, which is supposed to descend from heaven, was also witnessed by the pilgrims.

On Monday morning, April 22nd, the pilgrimage proper to Jerusalem closes. The first and second sections will leave at 7 o'clock for a tour through Palestine, Nazareth, the Sea of Galilee and Beyrout, whence the members of the second section start on their return trip, and the members of the third on a trip to Constantinople. The members of the first section leave here on Wednesday morning by coach for Jaffa, thence by Alexandria to Paris and home.

WHO FIRED THE SHOT?

Mysterious Shooting of a Man in a Buffalo Saloon.

A last (Friday) night's Buffalo despatch says: A mysterious shooting affair took place last night. Patrick A. Nealon, of Binghamton, came to Charles Sargeant's saloon and lodging house at Main and Balcom streets. At 1.30 he was shown to his room by Sargeant, and a few minutes later he was found lying on the sidewalk in front of the place with two bullet holes in his head. Nealon was still conscious when found, and said that he was shot by Sargeant, while Sargeant claims that Nealon shot himself. Sargeant was arrested, and Nealon was taken to the general hospital. One ball struck him above the right temple, and was taken from the top of the head. The other ball entered the head over the left ear, and was not found. It is thought that the wounds will not prove fatal. The pistol was found on the bed, and the shooting took place in the bed-room. As far as can be learned Sargeant went with his guest as far as the bedroom, where the shooting took place, but by whom it was done remains to be ascertained. After the shooting Nealon was evidently dragged out on the walk by Sargeant, which looks very suspicious, and goes to confirm Nealon's statement that Sargeant shot him. Nothing is known of any quarrel between the men, and Nealon was not drunk. No one is known to have been in the saloon at the time.

From the writings of H. M. the Queen's Physician in Scotland, T. Granger Stewart, M.D., F.R.S.E., on kidney disease, the following statement is taken: "Dropsy in the form of anasarca is almost constantly present in the early stage and during exacerbations of the inflammatory form." Consequently the attention should be turned to the restoration of the kidneys to a healthy condition on the first appearance of any puffiness or swelling about the eyelids, ankles or any part of the body. It is not difficult to make a selection of the remedy, for Warner's Safe Cure has long been before the public and given universal satisfaction.

OVER TWO HUNDRED SLAIN.

Fearful Slaughter in a Mexican Riot Over the Imprisonment of Priests.

A St. Louis despatch says: The following description of the riot at La Luz, near Guanajuato, Mexico, a few days ago, over the incarceration of five Jesuit priests who were stirring up the ignorant people against the Government, is given by a prominent citizen of Guanajuato who reached Texas yesterday: It was nearly dark when the priests were imprisoned, but by the time the street lamps were lighted 12,000 men roared and surged against the walls of the jail. They attacked its heavy doors with pickaxes, stones and crowbars, and heavy beams of wood, and some of them in a wild frenzy dashed their bleeding hands and heads against the massive walls. Many of them were armed, and in a short while a heavy fire was pouring into the windows. The Mayor of Guanajuato, who was inside the jail, was one of the first to fall. Policemen who rushed up in squads of two and three were remorselessly butchered, and in a short time more than twenty of them were lying on the pavement. A few scattered soldiers who were in town were treated in like manner. The mob, which by this time was utterly unmanagable, either by the Government or the priests who had incited it, now set fire to the jail doors, but just as the inmates were about to surrender two hundred regular soldiers arrived at the double quick and formed across the street. The mob answered the order to disperse with a yell and a discharge of firearms. The command to fire was at once given. The bullets at fearfully short ranges swept through the mass of men, women and children like a scythe, mowing them down in rows. Still they came on, and volley after volley crashed into them, only to cause those behind to spurn the dead bodies with their feet as they pressed forward. The streets were sticky with blood and the shallow gutters ran with it. In the meantime a number of insurgents armed with pistols and rifles had climbed upon the adjoining houses and the soldiers began to drop one by one. After a half hour's continuous fighting a charge with bayonets was ordered. When the front rank of the mob felt the steel the entire concourse broke and disappeared through the alleys and by-ways. Altogether more than 200 persons were slain, by far the greater part of whom were miners and other Mexican laborers. The soldiers lost sixteen killed and wounded. Among the slain was a lieutenant. The fire in the jail was quenched and the five badly frightened but still determined priests were taken to Guanajuato for safe-keeping. They are now confined in the Castle DeGrandelas, in which the great Mexican revolution had its birth, and in which the patriot Hidalago was subsequently hanged. It is thought that had the recent riot proved successful, and had the priests been rescued and the local authority broken, a serious uprising might have developed.

RIGHT OF WAY FIGHT.

Murderous Encounter Over the Laying of a Railway Spur.

A last (Sunday) night's New Brunswick, N.J., despatch says: Last night and this morning a fatal riot occurred at the Sayerville brickyards, five miles below this city. Agent C. P. Hendrickson, with 100 men, started last night to put in a spur from the main line of the Raritan River Railroad across the land of ex-Freeholder Edward Furman, down through the brickyards to William F. Fisher's yard. Furman was opposed to their crossing his land and called out his men. The railroad men were reinforced by brickyard men favorable to the railroad, until by midnight 500 men were engaged in the fight. Furman's men attacked the railroaders and burned the ties, material and a car. Pistols, clubs and stones were freely used. George Kissenger, one of Furman's laborers, was killed outright. He was knocked down with a club, and a sharp-pointed crowbar was jammed through his head. John Kennedy, a railroad man from South Amboy, was so badly injured that he died in an hour. At 4 o'clock this morning Sheriff Fick, of Middlesex County, called out a posse of fifty men and went to the scene. When they reached the place all was quiet, and the railroad men had stopped work to recruit their force. The Raritan River Railroad is a new enterprise running from South Amboy to Boundbrook. General E. T. Ripley, of New York, is President. Furman claims that the company is crossing his land without his consent, which the company claims he had given. Up to 6 o'clock this evening all was quiet, but the railroad men, who are encamped in the woods near the disputed spot, are being heavily reinforced from all along the line and trouble is expected to-night, as both parties are determined.

CATALEPSY MISTAKEN FOR DEATH.

A Young Married Woman Narrowly Escapes Being Buried Alive.

A St. Louis (Mo.) despatch says: A young married woman living in the southern part of the city, attacked by puerperal fever, fell into a state of catalepsy, and the physician in attendance certified to her death. Preparations for her burial were commenced, but just before closing the coffin her husband saw her arm move. He immediately had her taken from the coffin. Restoratives were applied, and in a short time she became conscious. She narrated a terrible tale, saying that she knew perfectly everything that was going on around her, and tried her best to show signs of life, but failed. She tried to scream, but could not, and her mental torture was frightful. When she came to she asked, "Where were you all when I screamed?" She was surprised when informed that she had made no sign. When she was lying in her coffin her arm cramped, and her husband happened fortunately to see her, thus saving her from a terrible death.

A Maine farmer, vowing death to foxes, placed a carcass near his barn and then connected it by wire under the snow with a bell in his bedroom. A fox could not do vigorous work on that piece of meat without ringing the bell, whereat the schemer would wake up and go forth to the slaughter. He killed twenty-five foxes by that device during the winter.

LIFE AMONG LUNATICS.

Alleged Cruel Abuse of a Patient—A Reporter's Exposure and a Doctor's stupidity.

A last (Thursday) night's Chicago despatch says: At the coroner's inquest to-day into the cause of the death of Robert Burns, a patient in the insane asylum at Jefferson, Attendants Richardson, Crogan and Pecha, charged with beating him to death, were present. The dead man's widow and her brother testified that Burns was in good health when he was sent to the asylum. Charles Beck, a reporter, who played the insanity dodge and was admitted to the asylum, detailed the repeated acts of brutality which the accused inflicted upon Burns. He declared the patient was not unruly, but seemed to be dazed. Beck testified that Burns was ordered to sit on a bench. He seemed not to understand, and did not do so, whereupon he was violently thrown down upon it. Rising in a dazed way, Richardson kicked him violently in the abdomen. Burns again arose, when Richardson caught him by the collar and threw him to the floor, and so the brutality continued, the accused kicking the helpless lunatic in the side and stomach, striking and cutting and bruising his face with their fists. They undertook to dress his wounded leg, jerking him about roughly and causing him excruciating agony, meantime continuing their blows. Crogan picked up Burns' shoe and, taking it by the toe, beat the patient over the head with the heel, cutting great gashes and covering the victim with blood. By this time Burns was in a semi-comatose condition. He was then jerked out of his seat, which was covered with blood that had run from his head. That night Burns was ordered to remove his clothes, but not complying, was slapped and cuffed. Finally the attendants stripped him and Richardson kicked him in the abdomen, knocking him across the seat. At another time witness heard blows in Burns' cell and loud cries from Burns, lasting several minutes. Attendants Schubert, Crogan and Richardson were there. Then a mop and a pail of water were brought, and the door was closed and locked. The attendants concluded he was too inquisitive, and he was removed to another part of the building. The reporter came out of the asylum at the end of ten days. Burns was then reduced to a skeleton, and was a sallow, hollow-eyed idiot. The reporter told how, when friends secured his release, Dr. Kirnan, superintendent of the asylum, shook his head ominously and advised against it. He declared the reporter was incurably insane. He knew this because he had watched the case closely. Dr. Schubert, of the staff, concurred in this opinion.

AFTER THE PARADE.

Accidents Attendant on the Great New York Demonstration.

A last (Wednesday) night's New York despatch says: In the parade to-day float No. 10, representing an immigrant ship, with deck, steerage and smokestack, while turning into Canal street out of Broadway was wrecked by a wheel of the truck being wrenched off by the car track. The upper part of the structure around the smokestack was occupied by half a dozen little girls in costumes, while below in the steerage were several women, the body of the car being filled with a few other women and a number of quaintly attired men with false boards. The frail structure toppled over and snapped and cracked, while the women and children slid and fell out. They screamed loudly and many policemen sprang forward to aid them. Fortunately the children only suffered from fright and they were carried away crying. The people standing near by left their places to lend assistance, and a momentary panic occurred. The police soon restored order. The wrecked float was pulled aside, and after an interruption of five minutes the parade continued. The chapter of accidents recorded by the police to-day was a long one, but not quite so large as yesterday. A number of persons fell in fits and were more or less bruised; others fell from horses and had limbs broken, and some spectators were crushed and hurt during the raids which the police found it necessary to make occasionally, in order to keep the streets clear.

A Steam Tricycle.

A Washington despatch says: This city was treated to a novel scene this morning. The first steam tricycle that ever appeared on the streets here was run down Pennsylvania avenue from the capitol to the treasury building and then about other of the principal thoroughfares. It is a very neat rig. The engine and boilers do not in bulk equal more than a couple of square feet, and are so distributed that they do not appear so large as that. The front seat resembles that of a buggy and was occupied by a young lady, while the ordinary saddle of the tricycle was placed behind and occupied by the party operating the engine. Oil is used as fuel for the engine, which is placed behind both riders so that the heat generated is not uncomfortable. Pedals are provided, to be used in emergencies, or when the steam power is not desired, and the device is apt to become popular among the employees of the departments, as it will give them all the pleasure of a buggy ride at an insignificant expense.

Prof. Semmola, of the University of Paris, in an article published in the Gazette Medicale de Paris, says: "Dryness of the skin, imperfect digestion and transformation of albuminoid food are present at the beginning of chronic Bright's disease." Warner's Safe Cure removes digestive disorders. Why? Because it enables the kidneys to perform their functions in a healthy manner, when both cause and resulting symptoms disappear.

A MANIAC'S FRENZY.

A Woman's Terrible Encounter With a Madman.

A Scranton (Pa.) despatch says: Thomas Flynn, who lives on the Diamond Flats, has been acting strangely for some time past, and his neighbors and friends had come to the conclusion that he was insane. He was kept in the house and carefully watched by his wife. This morning Mrs. Flynn went down town and left Flynn in bed. At about 10 o'clock John Bailey, a teamster; ex-Councilman P. F. Logan, weighmaster at the Diamond Mine, and another man were waiting for a car to be unloaded when they heard a piercing shriek emanating from the neighborhood of Flynn's house. Bailey and his companions at once ran thither and discovered that a struggle was going on in the house adjoining. Upon entering it they found Flynn, in a perfectly nude condition, engaged in a terrific struggle with the woman of the house. The maniac had a mine axe in his hand and the woman, almost exhausted, was trying to wrench it from his grasp. Bailey, assisted by the other men, secured the madman after an awful struggle. In the melee the axe fell on his foot and almost severed it. It was afterward learned that shortly after Mrs. Flynn left her husband arose from bed, tore his clothing from his body, and, grabbing the axe, rushed into the neighbor's house and struck the woman a heavy blow on the right breast, cutting a terrible gash. She will probably survive the encounter. Flynn is now in the station-house, a raving maniac.

DISGRACEFUL CLOSING SCENES.

Intoxicated Men and Disreputable Women Carouse in the Centennial Banquet Hall.

A New York despatch says: Both the Herald and Sun assert that the closing scenes of the inaugural ball at the Metropolitan Opera House yesterday morning were disgraceful. After 1 o'clock in the morning wine flowed in great abundance and many intoxicated men and some few disreputable women were carousing in the supper room and on the dancing floor. Many irresponsible persons without tickets are said to have been admitted by the door-keepers. The crowd became so great and boisterous that dancing was out of the question and the respectable people present made haste to quit the building. Great delay was experienced in getting hats and wraps from the cloak rooms—in some cases parties being compelled to wait over an hour before they could secure articles of apparel which had been left in those rooms. Many of the waiters in the supper room are also said to have become intoxicated and added to the blackguardism going on around them. Matters finally became so bad that the police were called upon to clear the supper room, which they were able to do only by the free use of their clubs. The hilarity was kept up until shortly after 4 o'clock, when the police were instructed to clear the house.

A Speech of Shakspearean Titles.

The subjoined speech was delivered by a gentleman at one of the Shakspearean anniversaries at Stratford upon-Avon, in the early part of the last century. It brings in the titles of the whole of Shakspeare's plays, with the exception of "Measure for Measure." He said: Mr. Mayor and Gentleman—The "Tempest" of applause which has followed the announcement of a name so unworthy as my own has left me a bankrupt in thanks, like the "Merchant of Venice." You cannot expect me to philosophise like "Hamlet," nor meditate like "Macbeth," yet I am as grateful as "Pericles;" but, were I to talk myself black in the face like an "Othello," my effort to express my gratitude as I could wish would but prove "Love's Labor Lost." Our worthy President and his supporter, like the "Two Gentlemen of Verona," have vied with each other to make the evening pass exactly "As You Like It." The chronicles of England from "Lear" to "Cymbeline" and up to "King John," and through the "Henries" and "Richards," to the reign of "Henry the Eighth," were but a "Comedy of Errors"; but the events of this night will serve to enliven many "A Winter's Tale" when life has passed away like a "Midsummer Night's Dream." Were I a "Romeo," and "Juliet" was to go off with "Titus Andronicus" or "Troilus," and "Cressida" was to elope with "Timon of Athens," I would not trouble myself about the "Taming of the Shrew," but in the event of this moment would save them to amuse themselves like the "Merry Wives of Windsor," and support my misfortune with the pride of a "Coriolanus"—nay, were I a "Julius Cæsar," I would not exchange my present honor to pass my "Twelfth Night" with "Antony and Cleopatra." I fear I am trespassing unwarrantably upon your time, and, as I had no claim on your attention, I have borrowed a few titles to your notice; and as "All's Well that Ends Well," I will conclude by offering you my sincere thanks, or you may charge me with making "Much Ado About Nothing."

Nothing Like Oil!

The regular income of John D. Rockefeller is twenty millions of dollars a year. That makes him the richest man in the United States, perhaps the very richest in the world. Mr. Rockefeller was the organizer of the Standard Oil Company, which has practically monopolized the oil trade of the United States, and was the forerunner of the big syndicates so much complained of.

DOMINION PARLIAMENT.

Si Richard Cartwright, on the House being asked to concur in the resolutions containing items for railways and canals, said that despite the fact that the Minister of Finance had declared that there would be no increase of expenditure this year, it appeared that there was a large increase. It was quite clear that the expenditure was gradually working up to $40,000,000. The most serious feature of the increase was that no less than $2,000,000 would hereafter be a fixed charge upon the country. He would give the Finance Minister credit for an earnest intention at the beginning of his official career to curtail the expenditure, but it was quite clear that intention had not been carried out. Canada was now obliged to raise $33,000,000 from the people, and that tax upon five millions of a population was a great burden. The sum would support 100,000 families at a higher rate of wages than were usually obtained in this Dominion. He moved in amendment, "That in the course of his budget speech it was said by the Minister of Finance that the expenditure of $12,738,000 would suffice to meet all the engagements of the Dominion on capital account up to the 1st of July, 1892, and would secure a fourteen foot canal system from Lake Superior to Montreal.

"That it now appears from a subsequent statement made by the said Minister of Finance and by other members of the Government that the requirements of the Dominion on capital account must be estimated for as follows:

For canals as aforesaid	$13,551,109
For Intercolonial Railway and subsidiary lines	3,000,000
For subsidies to railways	6,000, 00
Annuities, capitalized	4,000,000
For road from Harvey to Moncton, not less than	3,000,000
For minor public works	1,600,000

Being in all about $30,000,000. That the Government have further agreed to expend $750,000 per annum for a term of years to subsidize certain lines of steamships, less the amount now paid to the Allan and Dominion lines.

"That the said annual charge for subsidies and interest on the said $30,000,000 will involve an addition to the fixed charges of the revenue of $1,700,000 per annum.

"That the estimated expenditure for the year ending June 30th, 1889, is $37,893,384.

"That the inevitable effect of a large portion of this expenditure on capital account will be to diminish traffic and further increase the heavy deficit now existing in working the Intercolonial Railway.

"That under such circumstances the conduct of the Government in assuming these other and further obligations is reckless and improvident."

The amendment was lost on a division. Yeas, 40; nays, 73.

Sir Richard Cartwright, on the item for the Oxford & New Glasgow Railway, called attention to a statement by Sir Charles Tupper that the construction of the line would decrease the distance between that section of country and the upper Provinces by forty-five miles. When interrogated the other day the First Minister said this road would only result in a saving of seven miles. It was therefore evident that this expenditure had been undertaken under false representations. He moved that the item be not concurred in, inasmuch as the House was induced to undertake this work by statements that had no foundation in fact and by false representations.

The motion was lost on a vote of 39 yeas and 70 nays.

Mr. Davies drew attention to the policy of working the Intercolonial, which, he averred, was in the interest of the coal owners and against that of other classes of producers. Government supporters were wont to point with pride to the large increase in the coal traffic on the Intercolonial, forgetting that every ton of coal carried over this road was carried at a loss, and so an increased coal traffic only meant an increase in the already large deficit which the operation of this road annually showed. He moved an amendment censuring the discrimination in favor of the Springhill coal producers as against the farmer and lumberman, and calling for a reduction in the item for the service of the Intercolonial Railway.

The amendment was lost on a division. Yeas, 39; nays, 71.

Mr. Somerville, on the item of $95,135 for immigration, said he did not approve of the policy of the Government, which aimed more at inducing emigration from the older provinces to the newer districts. This plan merely produced a displacement of population, and only depopulated the older provinces when there was no corresponding influx of immigrants from abroad to make up the loss. The expenditure under this head revealed, he believed, the grossest extravagance and corruption, particularly in the case of special agents Smyth and Webster, whose examination before the Public Accounts Committee disclosed a course of conduct of a most questionable character. The account rendered by Mr. Smyth of $1,542 of salary and expenses was incorrect, unreliable, untruthful and fraudulent, and the conduct of the Government in allowing the account was scandalous in the extreme. He moved an amendment reducing the appropriation to $50,000. The amendment was declared lost on the same division, recorded.

Mr. Ellis, on the item of $2,000 additional salary to C. Schreiber, Chief Engineer of Government Railways, said he did not rise so much to oppose the increase as no say that Mr. Schreiber was very distasteful to the people of the Maritime Provinces, friends of the Government as well as enemies. He attributed much of the Intercolonial deficits to Mr. Schreiber's bad management, to his general impertitence to the people, and to his neglect of the public interest.

The item passed.

Mr. Platt, on the item of $250,000 to meet expenses in connection with the Electoral Franchise Act, moved an amendment to the effect that a complete and satisfactory voters' list is now and will continue to be available for Dominion election purposes in every Province of Canada, and that such can be secured without any expenditure from the public treasury.

The amendment was lost on a division.

The remaining items in the main estimates were concurred in.

Sir John Macdonald moved the House in committee on the railway subsidy resolutions. In reply to inquiries he stated that during the present year applications had been received by the Government for subsidies amounting to $21,000,000. Since 1882 the grants to railways had averaged $2,000,000 per annum.

Sir John Macdonald, on the resolution providing a subsidy of $375,000 for the construction of a tunnel under the St. Clair River, between Sarnia and Port Huron, said the proposed tunnel proper would be 5,280 feet in length, and with approaches of 10,000 feet. The estimated cost would be two and a half millions, and the work of construction was well under way.

Mr. Davies said that while the question of tunnels was under consideration he wished to press upon the Government the necessity for a tunnel under the Straits of Northumberland to connect Prince Edward Island with the mainland.

Sir John Macdonald said that if a tunnel across the Straits of Northumberland could be constructed at a reasonable cost it would be worth while to proceed with the work and settle the question of connection with the mainland.

The item then passed.

Sir Richard Cartwright asked for further information in regard to the proposed subsidy of $30,000 for the bridge over the St. John River at Fredericton.

Sir John Macdonald said that the total cost of the bridge had been $376,000. The Government had already advanced $300,000 to this work by way of a loan, secured by first mortgage bearing interest at 4 per cent. The bridge company was largely composed of Mr. Gibson, of St. John, and the member for York (Mr. Temple).

Mr. Temple, in answer to inquiries, said the annual revenue from the bridge was estimated at $30,000. The cost of maintenance would be about $2,000 per annum and the interest charge $15,000.

Mr. Laurier protested against what he believed was a most improper appropriation of public moneys for personal advantage. Here was a work which, by the admission of one of its principal owners, would yield a handsome revenue above the cost of operation, and yet the public money was advanced to nearly if not quite its full value, with evidently little hope of expectation that the amount would ever be repaid. He did not envy the position of the member for York, whose independence was so clearly affected by these appropriations, and public sentiment must be dead indeed if such acts would be condoned.

Sir John Macdonald said the badge of all the hon. gentleman's tribe was calumny, and he lost no occasion to attack hon. members and impugn the public opinion of the country. According to his idea, no member of Parliament could have an interest in any undertaking receiving Government aid.

Sir Richard Cartwright said it was a very old trick of the First Minister when he was pressed for an answer to assume a pretty fair semblance of passion. There was no doubt that the position of the member for York, who, it appeared, had good reason to expect this additional grant of $30,000 for some time, was utterly inconsistent with the independence of Parliament.

Mr. Davies asked if any bonds had been issued on this bridge. He considered that before the vote was taken the Government should make a plain statement of this.

Sir John Macdonald—I do not know that it would influence your vote.

Mr. Davies—If it is parliamentary to say so, I tell the right hon. gentleman it is a piece of impertinence to say that.

Sir John Macdonald—It may be impertinence, but it is true.

Mr. Davies—It is not true; it is false.

Sir John Macdonald—I challenge the hon. gentleman to name one single instance.

Mr. Davies—I voted against my party four or five times.

Sir John Macdonald—Name one.

Mr. Davies—On the Orange Bill.

Sir John Macdonald—That was not a party vote.

The resolution was carried.

Mr. Foster brought down further supplementary estimates.

Mr. Bain inquired if the Minister of Public Works was prepared to bring down to the House the report of the engineer who recently inspected the Dundas and Waterloo macadamized road.

Sir Hector Langevin said he would bring down the report of the chief engineer, which would give all the information required.

Sir John Macdonald intimated that it was the desire of His Excellency, if the state of public business would permit, to close Parliament on Wednesday.

Mr. Laurier inquired if the Government could now state what orders on the paper would be discharged and what would be proceeded with.

Sir John Macdonald moved that the Bill respecting the Rocky Mountain Park of Canada be withdrawn.—Carried.

Sir John Thompson moved that the Bill relating to bills of exchange, cheques and promissory notes be withdrawn. He expressed the hope that early next session the House would be prepared to take up this measure again and deal with it as its importance demanded.—Carried.

Sir A. P. Caron said that since he first introduced the Bill respecting the militia and defence of Canada, he had received a number of suggestions from gentlemen connected with the force which he thought were entitled to consideration. He therefore proposed not to proceed with the Bill this session, and he moved that it be withdrawn.

The motion was carried.

Sir John Thompson moved consideration of the Senate amendment to the Franchise Bill. He explained that the amendment merely gave power to mayors and aldermen to take statutory declarations in the same way as reeves and magistrates.

The amendment was concurred in.

The following Bills were read the third time:

To amend the Dominion Lands Act.

Relating to ocean steamship subsidies.

Mr. Davies inquired if it was the intention of the Government to press the Bill increasing the salaries of judges.

Sir John Macdonald said that was one of the measures which the Government had not yet decided to drop.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole on the railway subsidies.

Sir John Macdonald, on the vote for a subsidy for twenty miles from Kingston towards Smith's Falls, stated, in reply to an inquiry, that on a future occasion he hoped to persuade Parliament to subsidize the Kingston, Smith's Falls & Ottawa line for the remainder of the distance to Smith's Falls.

Sir John Macdonald, in moving the subsidy of $158,400 to the South Ontario Pacific, stated that the road would pass through a fine agricultural country, and that the subsidy would be used to assist the line from Woodstock to Hamilton.

Mr. McKay said the road was necessary to give the Niagara peninsula more direct access to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. Shanly protested against subsidies of this kind. He did not think it was proper to subsidize roads through a country like that through which this road would pass. It was in fact a competing line with the Great Western Railway and in a way interfered with vested rights.

Mr. Sutherland defended the subsidy.

The resolution passed.

Sir Richard Cartwright, on the vote of $63,000 for the Niagara Central Railway, said this line also passed through a section of country that was absolutely gridironed with railways. The system of duplicating lines was strongly to be condemned. The Government were adopting a policy which would result in the consolidation of all their lines into one huge railway system. He doubted the wisdom of this procedure.

Mr. Charlton said that these subsidies injured corporations which were entitled to consideration. So far from the public being benefited they had to pay for the maintenance of two lines instead of one, and then these lines combined to make their rates pay.

Sir John Macdonald said that a combination of railways could not produce any more serious effects than any one line could.

The resolution passed.

Sir John Macdonald explained that it was proposed to double the subsidy on 30 miles of the Baie des Chaleurs Railway and make it $6,400 per mile.

Mr. McMullen said this was another rotten arrangement.

Mr. Riopel, in answer to inquiries, said that for the first 15 miles the road had been aided to the extent of $15,000 by the Dominion. For the next 30 miles the subsidy had been $6,400, and it was now proposed to double the subsidy of $3,200 per mile on the next 30 miles. Besides this the Provincial Government had given a subsidy of $7,000 per mile. Bonds had been prepared and would be issued for $20,000 a mile. The stockholders had paid in $30,000. The President of the company was Senator Robitaille, and he (Mr. Riopel) was one of the directors. The contract price of the line was $20,000 per mile.

Mr. Mitchell said this was outrageous; with an investment of $30,000, subsidies to the extent of $1,180,000 had been secured.

Messrs. Davies, Gilmour and Mills denounced the arrangement.

The resolution was agreed to on a division in committee: Yeas 40, nays 23. The resolutions were reported.

Mr. Davies, in concurrence on the railway resolutions, moved an amendment striking out the vote of $30,000 for a bridge over the St. John River at Fredericton.

The amendment was lost on a division: Yeas 33, nays 65.

Sir Richard Cartwright moved in amendment that the sum of $30,000 to be paid to the Fredericton Bridge Co. be applied to the reduction of the $300,000 already advanced to the company.

The amendment was lost on the same division.

The second resolution granting a subsidy to the Baie des Chaleurs Railway Company was concurred in on a division: Yeas 66, nays 35.

A Bill founded on the resolution was introduced and read the first time.

Sir John Macdonald moved the House in committee to consider the resolution on which to found an address to Her Majesty, praying her to cause a measure to be submitted to the Parliament of the United Kingdom, declaring and providing the westerly, northerly and easterly boundaries of the Province of Ontario to be as therein described.

After some discussion resolutions were reported and referred to a special committee, which forthwith reported an address to be presented to Her Majesty.

The House went into committee on the resolution to provide for the construction of the Harvey-Salisbury short line as Government work.

Sir John Macdonald explained that the Government considered that the country was committed to see that this road was built. Already there had been two offers to construct the line at $16,000 per mile. One of those offers was by the Fredericton Bridge Company. On the completion of this road it would become part of the Canadian Pacific short line from Montreal to Moncton.

Sir Richard Cartwright asked what privileges the Canadian Pacific Railway would obtain over the Intercolonial.

Sir John Macdonald replied there would be merely an ordinary traffic arrangement. The Government considered that the Intercolonial could not be handed over to any private corporation. In order to keep to the compact of Confederation the Intercolonial must be always maintained as a Government line, in no case to be transferred or abandoned.

Sir Richard Cartwright said it appeared that to shorten the distance twenty-seven miles the country was to be taxed two millions. This was merely an expenditure for the purpose of making the Intercolonial an additional burden upon the country. Of all the proposals that had been made in the House for a long day this appeared to be the most irrational, most absurd, and, in many respects, most dishonest. He had very little reliance in the statements made by the Government. Ultimately it would prove that not one mile would be saved and the cost would be nearer four or five millions than two. It would be the means of destroying what little value remained in a railway system in which the country was interested to the extent of forty millions. A more improper proposal had never been made.

Mr. Weldon (St. John) contended that the C. P. R. was under obligations to build this line. It was a waste of money, and would not benefit the Province of New Brunswick. The new arrangement with the C.P.R would draw away traffic from St. John and destroy its legitimate trade.

Mr. Mitchell said that a pledge had undoubtedly been given on the part of the Government by Sir Charles Tupper that this link of road would be given. He regretted that the Government had determined on making good this pledge at an expense to the country of millions of money without securing any adequate return. It would have been better to have admitted what was the fact, that Sir Charles Tupper's statement was not true.

Mr. Jones said some provision should be made in the arrangement to give running powers to the Grand Trunk over this line.

The resolution was reported.

OTTAWA, May 2.—The third session of the sixth Parliament of the Dominion of Canada was formally prorogued this afternoon by the Governor-General, having been in session three months—a session of fair average duration. When the Governor-General gives his assent this afternoon to the measures subsequently passed, including those to go through their final stage to-day, the legislation of the session, as regards the number of Bills passed, will stand as follows: Government Bills, 46; Public Bills, 2; Railway Bills, 38; Insurance Bills, 4; Loan Company Bills, 5; Divorce Bills, 4; Mining and Mineral Bills, 2; Bridge Company Bills, 2; College Bill, 1; Church Bills, 2; General Bills, 5—total, 111.

The following is the text of

THE SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

Honorable Gentlemen of the Senate:
Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

In relieving you of the arduous labors which the present session of Parliament has imposed upon you, I rejoice that I am able to congratulate you on the number of important and useful measures which have resulted from your deliberations.

I have reason to hope that the authority which you have conferred on my Government will enable them to conclude an arrangement for effective steam communication with Europe and with Asia, whereby the trade and commerce of Canada will be widely extended and the traffic passing over her lines of communication greatly developed.

You have again made liberal provision for extending the railway facilities of the Dominion and for increasing their efficiency.

The Act relating to the electoral franchise will, I believe, be found an important improvement, tending to economy and certainty in the administration of that branch of the law.

The measure by which the system of speedy trials for criminals has been extended to the Maritime Provinces is likely to prove a valuable addition to our criminal procedure.

It is gratifying to know that your address referring to the boundaries of Ontario will lead to the early settlement of the principal question, which has remained unsettled to the present time, between that Province and the Dominion, in a manner entirely satisfactory to all concerned.

The amendment of the laws relating to copyright will, it is hoped, remove some of the embarrassments under which the printers and publishers of Canada have labored for some years past, without doing injustice to authors in this or other countries.

You have provided for greater efficiency and economy in the postal service, for giving greater facilities for the settlement of our lands in the Northwest Territories, and for increasing the safeguards of life and property on our ships.

Many of the other measures, although of a minor character, will be found of great usefulness in conducting the affairs of administration.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

You have liberally provided for the various requirements of the public service.

Honorable Gentlemen of the Senate; Gentlemen of the House of Commons.

In taking leave of you I congratulate you on the indications of prosperity which appear in all parts of Canada, and on the increasing revenue which promises amply to meet the appropriations for the year. I sincerely hope that in the season which is now opening the labors of our people may be blessed by Divine Providence, and that when it shall be my duty to summon you again I shall be able to renew the congratulations which I have already expressed on the marked welfare and progress of the Dominion.

Not Likely to Occur Again.

The London (Ont.) Free Press devotes half a column to a grave refutation of the theory, advanced by a wag in the guise of a scientist, that the low water in the Great Lakes is caused by a leak in the bottom of one of them. The wag-scientist is doubtless laughing in his sleeve.

The evident sincerity with which the London paper attacked the theory is almost as amusing as the alarm of the old woman whom the traveller in the then new West found crying in the doorway of her log cabin in "New Connecticut."

"What is the matter with you, my good woman?" he asked.

"Oh!" she replied, "a man who just rode by warns us that we must all escape for our lives, for the Indians have got a lot of pries under the Great Lakes and are going to tip them over and flood the country."—Syracuse Journal.

Make the Application Yourself.

"Dr. Philetus Dobbs" gives an amusing account of a Sunday school he visited "on the other side of the world." The superintendent tapped a bell, without uttering a word, and the chorister arose and led the singing. Another tap brought another man to his feet who read a chapter in the Bible. At a third tap a prayer was offered, and so it went on. He said to one of the teachers: "Things move on very quietly here. I noticed that you got to work at the lesson very soon." "Yes," said the teacher, "that is what I came here for." "I noticed also that the superintendent did not say a word." "He can't," replied the teacher, "he is dumb. We elected him because he couldn't talk, and we have had plenty of time for the lesson ever since. The last superintendent we had nearly talked us to death."—Louisville Western Recorder.

FREDERICK T. ROBERTS, M.D., Physician, to the Royal College of Surgeons, University of London, Eng., says: Loss of appetite, loss of eyesight, dyspeptic symptoms, irregularities of the bowels, are some of the symptoms of advanced kidney disease. Warner's Safe Cure cures these troubles, because it removes the cause, and putting the kidneys in a healthy condition, enables them to expel the poisonous or waste matter from the system. This is why Warner's Safe Cure cures so many symptoms that are called diseases.

FOR THE DREAD DIABETES.

Dr. Robin Considers Antipyrine an Indispensable Auxiliary to Treatment.

Dr. Albert Robin has made an important report to the Paris Academy of Medicine on the treatment of diabetes by antipyrine. Of itself antipyrine is not a cure for diabetes, but judiciously administered it exercises upon the patient a suspensive effect. Three grammes should be administered at the start, in three doses, given at intervals of four hours, and as far as possible from meal times, for antipyrine diminishes the activity of the gastric juice, as M. Albert Robin's researches prove. The medicament must not be pure, but associated with bi-carbonate of soda, in the proportion of half a gramme of the latter to one gramme of the former. After eight days of this treatment the diabetic symptoms are considerably ameliorated, when the use of antipyrine should be dropped, and the usual treatment of diabetes followed. If one patient becomes fatigued by the classic treatment, or if it ceases to have effect, resource is again had to antipyrine for a period of from six to eight days. These successive changes are continued as long as necessary, and judiciously combind appear to M. Albert Robin to be the best treatment for the disease.

The Archbishop and the Baby Show.

Referring to a proposed baby show mentioned in La Vie Illustree some time ago, La Semaine Religieuse, the official organ of Archbishop Fabre, says: "A strange project, assuredly, would be that of a baby show in Montreal. We simply, for the moment, mention the announcement of this ridiculous and anti-Christian competition, convinced as we are that public sentiment, the piety of the mothers and the respect they have for their children will be enough to make it impossible. True, the thing has been done elsewhere; but have we nothing else to do than to imitate the faults of a civilization having a tendency to revive Pagan customs?"

O listen! On the breezes glad voices come to day,
From many a wife and mother, and this is what they say
"The 'Favorite Prescription' works cures where doctors fail, Best friend of suffering women, O blessed boon, all hail!"

If every woman who suffers from diseases peculiar to her sex, knew of its wonderful curative properties, what a mighty chorus of rejoicing would be heard throughout the length and breadth of the land, singing the praises of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. It is the only medicine for women, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee, from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrapper, and faithfully carried out for many years.

Slipping Past the Palate.

Without nauseating those who take them, the little, sugar-coated Granules, known all over the land as Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets, produce an effect upon the bowels very different from that of a disagreeable, violent purgative. No griping or drenching follows, as in the case of a drastic cholagogue. The relief to the intestines resembles the action of Nature in her happiest moods, the impulse given to the dormant liver is of the most salutary kind, and is speedily manifested by the disappearance of all bilious symptoms. Sick headache, wind on the stomach, pain through the right side and shoulder blade, and yellowness of the skin and eyeballs are speedily remedied by the Pellets. One a dose.

To prevent over-sleeping, and thus risking the loss of their employment, the mail-carriers of Morocco resort to a unique and perilous scheme. They tie a string to one foot, and, as they know how long a yard or two will burn, they regulate the length of the string by the time they have to sleep. They light the string, which burns slowly, and when the fire comes to their foot they are painfully reminded that it is time to arise.

Confidence Begot of Success.

The confidence possessed by the manufacturers of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy in their ability to cure the worst cases of nasal catarrh, no matter of how long standing, is attested in a most substantial manner by their standing reward of $500, offered for many years past, for an incurable case of this loathsome and dangerous disease. The Remedy is sold by druggists, at only 50 cents. It is mild, soothing, cleansing, deodorizing, antiseptic and healing.

Farmers' Institute.

In compliance with a requisition by Messrs. John Oben, Asa Honeywell an other farmers and mechanics, a public meeting was held in Dunedin, township of Nottawasaga, county of Simcoe, on Monday evening, April 9th, when a farmers' and mechanics' Institute was successfully organized with Wm. Young J. P., president, Daniel Mitchell and Geo. Wetheral vice presidents, Richard Wetheral treasurer, and Walter T. Mastin, secretary. An executive council of twelve and other officers were duly elected.

Among other business transacted and resolutions passed were the following:

That this institute in session unanimously resolve that monthly public fairs be henceforth held in Dunedin, under the auspices of said mechanics' and farmers' institute. And that the first of said fairs shall commence on the first Tuesday of July next, for the sale and purchase or exchange of cattle, horses and sheep, with other live stock and articles of agricultural requirements, and productions including cash sales of butter, cheese, eggs, poultry, fruit, potatoes, hay, grain, dressed hogs, beef, mutton, etc.

That this Institute believes that substantial benefits to farmers and citizens generally, must result through properly organizing farmers' and mechanics' institutes as public instructing institutions, so that among other beneficial purposes to co-operate in establishing cattle selling fairs and weekly market days, with market accommodation for farmers and the public, therefore recommends farmers and dealers with professional men of all nationalities and politics, to kindly work their respective parts in order to successfully import the British principle of public markets and selling fairs, which, if public-like, instituted at market stations throughout Canada and the United States, must greatly help to improve villages, towns and townships in material and moral standing, for the united welfare of our New and Old World fellow citizens, as further referred to in a petition to the county council of the county of Simcoe, by rate payers in Floss, Sunnidale, Stayner, Nottawasaga and other municipalities.

That this institute, while thankfully acknowledging the public services rendered by N. Clarke Wallace, M. P., and those acting with him in the House of Commons on the Combine Bill against certain monopolies, further recommends members of parliament, farmers' institutes, Orange lodges and the public press to help themselves by advocating the aforesaid method of public weighing, to stay present monopoly buyers with their scales and weighers, preventing equal rights of fair competition at market buying stations.

That this Institute gratefully thanks the Flesherton Advance and other journals for publishing reports of farmers' councils and Institute meetings.

Whatever may be ones view of the merits of the Anti-Jesuit agitation, most thoughtful observers must come to the conclusion that it is being, in some respects, seriously mismanaged. The playing at cross purposes which is at times but too apparent is no doubt the result of partizan feeling, which it is impossible to suppress at once, and so cannot fairly be made a reproach to the movement itself, but only to certain of its supporters. But it can scarcely be doubted that the resolution to petition the Governor-General, as an alternative policy, to dismiss his constitutional advisers and appeal to the country is singularly ill-advised. To suppose that the Canadian people, after having wrought and fought for half-a-century to obtain full and Responsible Government, should now seek to overthrow the fabric reared with so much toil and care, by asking the Governor-General to take the prerogative of dissolution again into his own hands, seems almost absurd. It is not easy to see how any one who understands and cherishes the representative system can put his name to such a petition. It seems as if the only logical course open to the people, assuming the great majority to be in favor of disallowance, is to move as individual constituences against the members who no longer represent their views. Very few members would care to withstand a distinct demand for their resignation made by the great majority of their supporters. Here is a clear channell through which the Government may be effectually reached. But, strange to say, we have as yet heard of no instance in which the voters in any constituency have called for the resignation of their member in consequence of his obnoxious vote in the Commons.—The Week.

The Markdale Standard still upholds its lynch law sentiment with reference to Gabriel Dumont. We do not quarrel with the Standard's belief that Dumont has deserved punishment, but when it comes to punishment we hold that Canada has enough law to meet the case without resorting to the heathenish custom of lynching. It is well known that the Metis have a genuine grievance. Being halfbreeds they are obliged to conform to the laws which govern the Indians with respect to landed property, and which of itself is most odious to any people with spirit. There are certainly other ways of gaining rights besides rebellion, as the Standard says, but there are also other ways of administering laws without appealing to Judge Lynch.

The colony of New South Wales is the only one in the realm that does not remunerate its members of the legislature.

Spring Assizes.

(O. S. Advertiser.)

WHITE vs ROBERTSON.—Was an action brought by manufacturs in London for the price of steam thresher sold to one Robertson of Bentinck. The plaintiffs produced a written agreement signed by defendant, and proved the delivery of the steam engine. By this agreement plaintiffs were bound to furnish a 14 horse power engine capable of driving a separator with a 39 inch cylinder. The defence was that the engine was not a 14 horse power, that it would not drive a 39 inch seperater, that the spark arrester was defective, etc. Judgement for defendant. O'Connor of Walkerton for plaintiff; J. Creasor for the defendant.

MCGLENGING vs JOHNSTON.—Action for seduction of plaintiff's daughter. No defence Damages assessed at $500. J. M. Kilbourn for plaintiff.

MEAFORD vs LANG.—The Town of Meaford sued the two sureties of ex Collector Watt, for the amount of his default, some $2,500. Defendants showed that the town council had repeatedly extended the time for the return of the Collector's Roll, that even at one of the Council mettings Councillor Robertson had stated that Collector Watt was either not collecting the taxes as he should or else he was using the money, and the said Councillor moved that action be taken in the matter. His motion did not carry. The plaintiffs did not deny that the Collector had been granted extra time and that repeatedly for returning the Roll; but plaintiff's counsel drew from the sureties themselves while in the witness box that they knew of these extensions: that report of Council meetings were presented in the Meaford papers, that they had probably read these reports, etc. Argument to take place in Toronto. L. A. Lash, Q.C., and Wilson & Evans for plaintiffs; Kerr, Q.C. & Mr. Miller for defendants.

School Matters.

To the Editor of The Advance.

DEAR SIR—Tyrone in your issue of 16th inst. still tries to throw doubt upon the facts that the population of this section ever was or is now up to the statute requirement of fifty within school age. Naked facts are stubborn things, and will not yield even to sworn official statements. We have the facts, and Tyrone or any one else interested can satisfy himself by calling upon the secretary of the school trustees here and examining the list for himself. We are afraid that with Tyrone the wish is father to the thought when he thinks that the population was or is now below legal requirements, and if the figures given by Tyrone be correctly taken from returns made by officials under oath, the official returns should at once be carefully looked in to and not have the whole township suffer in its portion of the government school grants. The school here is in a very healthy state at this moment. With thanks for your insertion of our statements, we are, yours truly

She was deep in ev'ry science 'neath the sun,
(O, indeed 'twas fun)—
Cosmogony, Geogny,
Philology, Geology,
Geometry, Photometry—
But 'twas the saddest story to confess,
She could not sew a button on a dress!

She would spend a day or two upon a rhyme,
(What a high old time!)
Threnodes, Epodes,
Poems, Proems,
Lyrics, Pyrrhics—
But ev'ry time she went a thing to buy,
She surely would be cheated on the sly!

Ev'ry language ever written she would try,
(She could speak, oh my!)
Illyrian, Iberian,
Hebraic, Chaldaic,
Indian, African—
But when, ye gods, her cooking I recall,
I'm bound to state she could not cook at all!

And I? Oh, I don't count for much, you see,
Do not, pray, mind me)—
Wandering, pondering,
Shaking, quaking,
Toiling, moiling
I have to stick to her through thick and thin,
I've married her—that's where the joke comes in.

ESTELLE'S INFATUATION:

A NOVEL.

"This time I have taken two steps forward and fallen back one. The next time I shall make three and fall back none,' thought Lady Elizabeth, she too breathing more freely because of the hope she had that she could win poor Estelle's forgiveness when the day of her ordeal should come

After this first and only brush that had ever been between the two, Anthony and Lady Elizabeth were yet oftener together and still more and more to each other than before. The old days at Kingshouse seemed to have been translated into these new conditions at Thorbergh; but had there been the smallest approach to flirting or levity on either side, Mrs. Smythe Smith would have taken the alarm, and there would probably have been a little scene of remonstrance or a false excuse for departure. But there was nothing to agitate the most sensitive prudery. Lady Elizabeth was grateful to her hostess for her trust. Knowing what she did, and having that ulterior object ever before her eyes, she held by her friendship with Anthony as the last hope of salvation poor Estelle was likely to have.

It was a heavy burden, however, to know what she did and keep it back from the one most interested. If she could but bring him to a milder frame of mind she would tell him. He ought to divorce his poor erring wife, to set her free to marry Charlie. If only she could influence him to this better and more magnanimous course! Meanwhile she made herself almost necessary to his existence; and the power was waxing secretly and unknown to himself, as the roots of the flowers swelled beneath the sod, and the sap in the trees rose ever higher. And as a further clamp and rivet, Estelle's little two-year-old boy had "taken to" Lady Elizabeth, and when he saw her would smile to her and hold out his little hands, and make much of her when she took him in her arms.

"You see we all love you, Lady Elizabeth," said Anthony one day, in his half-bitter and half-serious way. "My boy, my dog, and even I, who, in your eyes, am not so good as either."

CHAPTER V.

IN DIRE DISTRESS.

Meanwhile Estelle's cup of misery was full—so full that surely there was no room for more! In the earthquake she and Charlie had lost all they possessed, save the clothes in which they escaped and such loose silver as chanced to be in their pockets. Alone, and cut off from their past, disgraced where they were, penniless, was there a lower deep?

At their only chance, they wrote to Mary, whom now they knew to have been the anonymous sender of those sporadic supplies; whose other secret also they knew. Estelle was thus doubly bound to this coarse, vulgar car of cheatery and deception, for they knew her guilt and she knew theirs, and neither dared to betray the other. But Mary and her mother had the whip hand, and knew it.

But when Estelle wrote to them, giving an account of the earthquake and their losses, and asking for help, mother and daughter consulted together in adverse mood enough, and pronounced it a shame for grand folk like those to come upon poor people like them.

"Do they think we are made of money?" asked Mrs. Latimer, shrewishly.

"If they do, they'll have to find out their mistake," said Mary, grimly.

So much of grace, however, had they as to remit Charlie Osborne a very small pittance, just to meet the most pressing wants of the moment—sending therewith a curt and disagreeable letter full of covert insolence, saying that it was impossible for them to satisfy these constant and exorbitant demands—and that really Mrs. Harford must apply to her own people, who were better able to keep her than they. Poor folk like them had enough to do to keep their own heads over water.

Perhaps no trial had been greater to these two desolate creatures than was this letter, with its meagre remittance so reluctantly sent, its insolence so slightly veiled. It was a terrible moment. Even that when Anne had marked them with the brand of shame was less terrible than this; for this included the same confession of shame, and more besides.

Then Estelle made up her mind. It was a trial, but it was not a hazard. She knew the man, and felt sure that she could trust him. He was good and unselfish, and he had once loved her. Now that he was rich he would help her; even though helping her meant helping the man who had stood between them.

Her cheeks burned as with fire; her hands were cold as marble; her heart throbbed with hope and fear and the shame of downcast pride all in one; but it had to be done. Caleb Stagg was her last chance, failing a direct appeal to Anthony—or one yet more direct, to death and God! But the loving cling to life, however miserable they may be, if they can but live together. The dust of dead joys is better than the peace of eternal sleep, if only they can hold each other's hand and forget their wretchedness in a kiss. When things are at their extreme it is time enough voluntarily to die. While they love they are never at this extreme; and Estelle, who knew that her beloved was now dying, would not have hastened that invitable hour, no, not by one moment of coveted time. Wherefore she took her courage in both hands—wrote the story of her distress and denudation to Caleb Stagg, and spoke quite naturally of "Mr. Osborne" and of his state of health, and of her having joined him to look after him. She had, however, to add the slight change of name, and how they were known here at their hotel as "Mr. and Mrs. Charles," which gave a somewhat different complexion to the pure philanthropy of looking after her old friend and playmate, fallen into such a condition of health as demanded a competent nurse.

The first answer came by telegram. By return of post a substantial remittance was the second; and Estelle had not miscalculated. This sandy-haired, snub-nosed, ungainly omad'haun was truly the bit of human gold she had believed him to be; the hump between the hunchback's shoulders was, then, the sheath wherein were folded the angel's wings; and Love, pure, unselfish Love, once more vindicated its right to be held as the god of the world and the great centre of all life that is worth living.

The day was warm and bright, and the place was at its loveliest. Sea and sky were of the same deep blue, and both were as tranquil as twin children sleeping face to face. It was a day which moved the world to love and laugther—wherein the thrill of life was as strong as the sunshine and as passionate as the nightingale's song—as sweet as the scent of roses and orange flowers—as divine as the kindly gods who rule the destinies of the fortunate and happy. It seemed impossible to be even ill at ease on such a day. And yet what grief was in that chamber looking to the sea and across to the far distant land—what dread in the present! what terror of the future!

The supreme moment had come at last, and poor, weak, handsome Charlie Osborne was at the end of all his failures and at the outset of his great journey. He had lived to his last moment, and he had now to resign himself to the inevitable parting from the woman whose life his love had ruined and whom his death would leave desolate and destroyed. He half hoped, indeed, that she would not consent to live after him—that she would die either by force of nature or by the act of her own free-will. He scarcely thought she could live, and he hidden away from her in the narrow grave. It seemed sacrilegious—almost criminal. For all the wise tenderness and larger outlook which death brings to the dying, poor Charlie could not rise quite above that egotism which had been the ruling passion of his life. And yet he was not a bad fellow, taken any way. He was weak to his own desires, self indulgent to his own fancies, and he had that fatal artistic temperament which cannot live or do good work under the strain of self control. He must be cradled like a child in the arms of love, and fed like fabled fairies on the most gracious food of heaven. And what was good for him as an artist was good for him all through. His egotism was so far tempered and excused; but it had wrought infinite mischief, take it how one would

He was lying now quite still, breathing with extreme difficulty, his eyes for the most part shut; but every now and then he opened them on Estelle sitting motionless and silent by his bedside. It was painful to him to speak. He had neither breath nor strength for articulation.

Suddenly the life that was ebbing slowly away flowed back with transient strength, and the fire that was dying down blazed up anew with power and brightness

"You must write to Lady Elizabeth,' he said to Estelle. "If you can, reconcile yourself with your husband and get him to make you an allowance.

It was like some one else speaking, and Estelle quivered with a superstitious kind of dread. It was so unlike Charlie to think of means and measures—to plan or to foresee! What strange revelations and stranger metamorphoses were bound up with this dread passage? Was the soul transformed before the body ceased to hold it?

"I will, if you wish it, Charlie," she answered.

"Lady Elizabeth will be your friend," he continued. "Now that I am going, you want some one to befriend you."

"I will obey you, darling," she said, softly.

A little smile broke over his wasted features.

"Always the same," he said. "The sweetest and the best on earth!"

She kissed his hand lying in hers, and then he closed his eyes and spoke no more. His breathing grew fainter and fainter—more interrupted, more labored. There was a curious look of general collapse about the whole pose of the body, and the hand in hers was limp and lifeless. Through the partially unclosed lids she saw that the eyes were turned, and over the face and brow broke out the clammy sweats of death. The open lips were as full of pain as the lips of the Medusa in her agony; and then came that hoarse rattle in the throat which told of the supreme moment. Estelle rose to her feet and bent over the body of her dying lover. She neither rang nor called for the help or the companionship of her kind. Alone, as she had lived with him, so would she be when he died, and no stranger should desecrate the solitude of their love.

With straining eyes and a heart that throbbed as if it would burst within her bosom, she stood there watching till the last faint breath was drawn, and the life she had loved better than her own had sobbed itself away into nothingness and death. She knew when it came, and bent over with parted lips laid close to his to receive that last breath. She gathered it like a caress. It was like his very soul entering forever into her body—his last touch, his last word!—then darkness and a vague sense of falling came over her. She heard nothing; she knew nothing. That knock at the door—that hurried tread of a man's entering feet—that voice—all were lost to her, while a strong arm caught her as she fell, and a voice whispered softly: "Ah, my queenly lass, but thou'st come to a bad pass! God help thee, as I will!"

CHAPTER VI.

HER COMFORTER.

"God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb." Sometimes; not always. The tempering to Estelle, for instance, was of the slightest quality, so far as she herself was concerned—that essential She which felt and suffered. Being, however, dead to all but her own suffering, she scarce recognized the benefits showered on her by Caleb Stagg, but took them as we take the flowers of the gorse on the common when we are wandering, foot-sore, faint and weary, our way lost, our direction unknown, the darkness of the night settling down.

Yet Caleb was of use to Estelle—of as much use and of a like kind as the nails and joints which hold the coffin planks together. He took all the trouble off her hands and let her indulge her grief unchecked. This was the best thing he could do for her; and she had a vague perception of its value. He was no more obtrusive than an intelligent machine; and Estelle, with the unconscious selfishness of grief, treated him with little more thought than if he had been a machine. Do we feel grateful to the nails and joints of the coffin planks, without which, however, our dear dead would be in sorry plight enough? They hold the coffin together, and keep the beloved safe from marauding beasts and birds of prey. But do we love them for that? Could she then love the man who arranged the details for Charlie's funeral, and so separated her from him forever?

The fatal day had come and gone, and Estelle was now alone in the world, so far as her own consciousness of companionship went. She had almost forgotten her child; her husband had ceased to exist; her father and mother were as dead worlds, and her whole past life at Kingshouse was a void. She had but one thought—one sentiment—her lost Love, and the bleak blackness of life without him. The spasm of something that was almost shame, which Anne's scorn had awakened, had gone into nothingness. Had she been asked, she would have planted her pride on her union with Charlie, and her shame would have gone to her marriage with Anthony. The one which the world disdained and the law condemned was pure; the other, which men called a sacrament, was impure. So she thought and felt, and Caleb was not the man to try to convince her of wrong reasoning.

But her state alarmed him. This blank and motionless despair was as a sickness he was unable to understand or cure. Had she wept or bewailed herself, had she been irritable in her grief and peevish in her sorrow, he would have known his way better; but to be so still and silent and patient and lifeless was something beyond his ken, and he was frightened in proportion to his ignorance. She had fallen into the same state as that which had come on her after she had married Anthony, save that she had not that point of horror and personal shrinking which had then been her active cross, and which she had put all her energy into concealing from the man whom she never felt to be aught but her purchaser and tyrant. To Caleb she was as indifferent as if he had been a trained dog walking on its hind legs, but as gentle as she was indifferent. Sometimes she would stop the carriage and ask Caleb to get her such and such a flower that she saw by the way-side.

"Charlie will like that," she would say; and when the flower was laid on his grave she seemed to feel a certain pleasure, and over her poor pale face would steal a faint sad smile, as if answering back one from him there in the dark grave beneath her feet.

Once she startled Caleb by saying, with unconscious parody of a more famous reduplication: "I think no woman's lover but mine died twice. Once before I married him, and once after."

"It has been a sore trial for you," said Caleb, not knowing what else to say, and, by the way, not knowing what to call her.

This, in its degree, was a trial to him, accustomed as he was, like all people of his condition, to bring in the name of the person to whom he was speaking at every turn. It seemed to him so bald and unciv il not to give Estelle some kind of distinctive name. He could scarcely "bring his tongue" to call her Mrs. Charles, and he would not wound her by calling her Mrs. Harford. When he did stumble over a designation at all, it was the former, for he would rather wound his own conscience than her feelings.

"Yes," said Estelle, "God has been very hard to me—very cruel. I wonder why?"

"Those whom He loveth He chasteneth," said Caleb, in a low voice. "Because He loves you, Mrs. Charles."

"And therefore killed my darling twice. I do not call that love," she answered, and sank again into silence, from which Caleb did not dare to try and rouse her.

It was natural that the whole story should have excited a great interest in the English colony, both rooted and nomadic, which found itself on the shores of this enchanting sea. Its mixture of pathos and criminality gave a pleasant savor to gossip; and pity, touched with condemnation, made a more interesting state of mind than one sentiment alone could have produced. To this was now added curiosity. Who was this man who had come to take possession of this sorely wounded Impropriety? He was not her husband, evidently not a relation, and as evidently not a servant. He was too respectful for the one, too familiar for the other; also he was not up to her height socially; yet he had the command of money to a fabulous extent. The young English clergyman and his wife, who might have solved the mystery, had left the place; and conjecture exhausted itself in vain. She more beautiful and more desolate than Ariadne herself, and he the queerest looking god that ever leaped from a car, steam-driven or panther-drawn, what chain could bind them together? It was not love, and it was not blood; and the world is not quick to recognize the unselfish heroism of devotion.

If nothing was known here, all was patent at Kingshouse, and the bad, black news flew about the place as fast as if carried on bats' wings in the twilight. It made the staple of conversation, and was "the shame and the burning" of the hour. Not content with having left her own lawful husband for one man, this exceedingly improper person, this Mrs. Harford, had inveigled another. And such another! The golden calf, the butt of his county, was her latest sacrifice; and he, the fool that he was, did not see how she was making use of him, and how she was treating him as a mere foot-stool or hearth-rug! It was really too shameful, look at it as one would! She was past praying for, of course. She was lost for time and eternity, saving a miracle of grace to snatch her from those eternal fires she so richly deserved. But he, though he was a born idiot, all but qualified for Earlswood, he was too good and simple minded to be made the victim of an artful intrigante who destroyed men's lives as cruelly as if they had been sacrifices offered up to Moloch.

Kingshouse waxed fierce in its virtue at this time. No Jew ever scraped his floors and walls with more zeal at Passover to make sure that no forbidden scrap of leaven lurked therein than did the whole society of Estelle's old home repudiate her and her misdeeds. No one dared to sympathize with her sorrow for fear of seeming to condone her sin, and the general verdict was: "She deserves all she got;" and "She brought it all on herself, the hussy!"

Mrs. Clanricarde had to bear more taunts and sneers and cold shoulders and tossed-up heads than her pride well knew how to endure; and that foolish George was crestfallen to a degree he had never been, even when he had most severely burned his fingers in the fire of the House.

And when that foolish George wept, and said that nature was stronger even than morality, his wife metaphorically bit off his head, and told him he was an atheist, and she would hear no more of his blasphemy. She even went so far as to say: "That miserable girl or me, George. If you go to her, you leave me forever. Besides, where, if you please, is the money to go with? You have taken care that we shall never have a five pound-note to spare from our creditors. How are you to go? Let that hideous young man bear the burden. He has plenty of money. And when Mr. Harford divorces her he will marry her; and so she will not have to starve which is as much as she can expect and more than she deserves."

To such a pass of hardness—like to the nether millstone—had large social ambition, personal pride, and perpetual poverty brought the mother's heart, which under more favorable conditions would have been soft and loving enough.

Of Mrs. Aspline, too, it must be sorrowfully said that, on this matter of Estelle's disgrace, she disclosed the one black spot in her otherwise rose-red heart. She was for the most part a kind old thing—a generous-natured old Cookey; but this was one pull that wrenched her good-nature asunder, and let the little stream of gall trickle forth. The contrast to be made between snow-white Anne, under the hallowing influence o the matrimonial sacrament, and this besmirched Estelle, niether wife nor widow, was too strong to be resisted. She must show Mrs. Clanricarde her disdain. And she did.

Things at Mentone continued pretty much as they had been ever since poor Charlie's death. Estelle's intellect seemed benumbed, and showed no signs of rewakening.

One day she and Caleb were sitting by the grave, where she used to pass some time of every day. She used to say she was "going to Charlie," when she made her friend understand she wanted to go to the cemetery, and imagination supplied something almost like reality. Charlie was always alive to her.

Suddenly she looked up into Caleb's face.

"I suppose the world thinks I did wrong? Anne Aspline said so," she said, asking a question by the inflection of her voice.

"I suppose so," said honest Caleb, uncomfortably. How he wished that he could have repudiated the idea, and have shouted, "No!" to all the four quarters of heaven! But even though it was Estelle who had done it, for a married woman to leave her husband and live with another man was a long way beyond the limits of the morally permissible.

"And did you—do you?" she asked again.

He writhed in spirit. Abstractedly, yes. The act had been profoundly immoral; but his was not the hand to hurt that already so cruelly wounded dove. And what mattered it what he thought? Who was he, to lay down a law or presume to find fault with such as she?

"I would never blame aught you did, Mrs. Charles. You know what you do, I reckon," he answered, humbly.

"But you think I did wrong all the same," she persisted, with the obstinacy of a sick mind.

"It would have been an ill thing in any one else," he returned.

"I don't see the difference," she said. "I am no better than another. He was; but I am not."

"Why do you talk of it?" said Caleb. "Please don't, Mrs. Charles. You did what you'd a mind to do, and so let it bide."

"I did what I ought to have done," said Estelle, with a curious emphasis. "They had all deceived me—all made me commit that first sin. This was no sin, the other was. This was only putting things straight again."

"That should comfort you to think of," said Caleb, his eyes cast down.

"But now I have one wish—only one," she continued. "I want Mr. Harford to divorce me. Then I will be married to Charlie by the Church before I die."

"Good Lord!" cried Caleb, aghast. "Mrs. Harford—Mrs. Charles—oh, my dear lady, what ever is it you are saying! Do think a bit! How can you be married to him and him a-lying here?"

"Oh yes, they will. I am sure I can," was her reply. "He is not dead, you know. Only his body is dead, but his soul is alive, and I can be married to that—my soul to his before I die—and then we shall be all right when we meet in heaven."

"Lord sakes!" said Caleb. "Did ever any one hear the like?"

"If you had as much faith as you ought to have you would understand me," answered Estelle; "and," again looking him full in the face, "you would sympathize with me and uphold me."

"I will uphold you, Mrs. Charles, in all and aught you wish to do," said Caleb, with passionate solemnity. "But this is such an idea! I don't well see how it can be. I doubt if ever a clergyman would be got to do it."

"We will see," said Estelle. "And I intend to write Mr. Harford and ask him. He will not refuse. He knows that I am not his wife now, and never was. I was only his married slave. My mother sold me and he bought me; and I owe him no more than any other slave owes her master. And not so much, indeed!"

"If you get him to divorce you, it will be another big talk," said Caleb. "Folks have talked enough at present; I'd be main sorry to give them more to set their teeth on!"

"Would you like me to go back to Mr. Harford?" she asked, a little haughtily.

"Nay that would I not," he answered, with his heart in his good, honest, homely face. "What I would like best of all is that you should have some lady friend, like Lady Elizabeth, to come and bear you company, Mrs. Charles; and that you'd just let me go on as I am, looking after you and seeing that you want for naught. But I want no more clatter and no more worry to you. And if I were you I'd leave Mr. Harford alone until we see how things turn of themselves."

"It is not fair," she answered. "I owe it to my darling's memory to get rid of this hated name, which I suppose is legally mine. Do you know, Mr. Stagg, I had almost forgotten it. For all these months that I have been with Charlie I never remembered that I was not legally his wife till that dreadful girl reminded me. And then I forgot it again when he went from me. It is only quite lately that I have thought of it, and that I want so much to get rid of Mr. Harford, and to be his, my darling's wholly and entirely."

"It is a sweet thought, and like yourself, Mrs. Charles," said poor Caleb, in terrible perplexity how to meet this thought which was so insane, though the mind in which it was born was saner in this than in some other things. "But I think it wants considering. And if you'll be guided be me, you'll wait until you are a little stronger before you put yourself about again. Will you let me write to Lady Elizabeth? That would be the wisest thing to do. If she could come here for a bit, that would be about the best job we could get through."

"Yes," said Estelle. "Write to her. She was always good to him, and he liked her. He would be pleased for me to have her here. Yes, do write. Let us go home," she added, feverishly. "Let us go home at once, and do you write at once."

"I'll go for the trap," said Caleb, bending to her mood as the shadow follows the substance. "We shall be in time for the post, I dare say, and she'll have the letter the day after to-morrow."

"Dear, dear Lady Elizabeth!" cried Estelle, to whom this new thought had give a new impulse. "Oh, if she was but here! She would help me! she would comfort me!"

How to Drink Tea.

As commonly prepared, tea is so bitter and disagreeable that the addition of milk becomes almost necessary to make it palatable. But to put milk or cream into properly prepared tea is to commit an unpardonable gastronomic solecism, not only for the fanciful reasons that a chemical compound results from the mixture resembling the basis of leather, but that the basis of milk disguises the peculiar aroma of tea, and makes one kind taste almost exactly like another, very much in the same way as French cooks sometimes spoil the natural flavor of fish with their eternal sauces, till you are unable to tell whether you are eating salmon or shark, catfish or dogfish. Sugar, on the other hand, may and should be added to tea. For it makes the taste of the tea more agreeable without in the least interfering with its fragrance. Milk and tea soon become very insipid to the sense of those who have accustomed themselves to drink plain tea. Moreover there is a special enjoyment to be derived from each kind of tea; and how actually the sense of smell can be educated in the art of discriminating teas is shown in the case of professional tea tasters, who can distinguish not only the country and the locality where the leaves were grown, but the year and season, and even the ship that brought them across the ocean.—Contemporary Review.

THE LATE DR. J. G. HOLLAND, the eminent writer and physician, wrote and published in Scribner's Magazine: "It is a fact that many of the best proprietary medicines of the day are more successful than many physicians, and most of them are first discovered and used in actual medical practice. When, however, any shrewd person knowing their virtue, foreseeing their popularity, secures and advertises them, then, in the opinion of the bigoted, all virtue went out of them." The late Dr. Dio Lewis, in speaking of Warner's Safe Cure, says: "if I found myself the victim of a serious kidney trouble, I would use your preparation." Dr. R. A. Gunn, M. D., author of "Gunn's New Improved Handbook of Hygiene and Domestic Medicine," says: "I am willing to acknowledge and commend thus frankly the value of Warner's Safe Cure." The celebrated Dr. Thompson, of the University of the city of New York, says: "More adults are carried off by chronic kidney disease than by any other malady except consumption."

First Lady of the Land.

"Is it proper to speak of Mrs. Harrison as the first lady of the land?" That depends. If our correspondent has a wife, she should be the first lady of the land to him. If he has no wife, his mother should be the first lady, and if he has no mother either, then his oldest sister. If he is an unmarried orphan, without sisters, he may be right in looking to the wife of the President as the first lady of the land, but any day he may meet some other lady who will change his opinion and her name.—Hartford Courant.

Six Tall Britishers.

At the presentation of Sir Julian Pauncefote to the President on Friday, the Blue Parlor of the White House sheltered some very striking-looking men. Pauncefote is 6 feet 6 inches in height, his Secretaries of Legation, Edwards and Herbert, are more than 6 feet each, and the other Englishmen present were almost as tall. Walker Blaine estimated that the aggregate height of the six Britishers was 37 feet.—Philadelphia Ledger.

To Waterproof Hammocks.

Hammocks that are allowed to hang out most of the time are soon rotted by the action of the weather. It is said that they may be made "waterproof" by immersing in boiling linseed oil, and leaving them in it for a day or two. Then with a cloth rub off all the oil possible, and when the netting is dried it will last much longer than it otherwise would.

IMPERIAL FEDERATION.

Principal Grant, of Queen's College, Kingston, Speaks in Hamilton

TO A PRETTY FAIR AUDIENCE.

It Is Decided to Form a Branch of the League in Hamilton.

It was somewhat of a surprise to those who attended the Imperial Federation meeting in the Grand Opera House on Saturday night that the attendance was not larger. The down stairs was fairly filled and a couple of dozen or so of people sat in the gallery. In all perhaps 500 people were present. Upon the stage sat quite a large number of influential citizens, among them being ministers, doctors, lawyers and representatives of other professions.

Mayor Doran occupied the chair and in opening said—Whenever a public meeting is called and I am requested to preside I do so with pleasure because it is a duty. The question of Imperial Federation is one of importance, but my views upon it are not yet definite enough to express here. I will therefore call upon Principal Grant and Mr. McCarthy to address you upon the subject.

PRINCIPAL GRANT'S ADDRESS.

Principal Grant was given a hearty ovation upon arising. He said—Mr. Mayor, ladies and gentlemen, I wish to ask a few plain questions of my fellow citizens to-night and to answer them calmly and without imputing motives to any one. My first question is a very important one, as upon its answer hangs the weight of all the others. It is, "Is Canada in a condition of stable equilibrium?" You may ask what that means. Well, apply it to a man and a man is not in an enviable position if he is not in a condition of stable equilibrium. A country not in a condition of stable equilibrium is not on a sound political foundation. My answer is that Canada is not in a condition of stable equilibrium. There is an uncertainty about its affairs and anxiety about its future which are alarming. Three months ago while in Australia I saw that the newspapers of Canada were discussing annexation, independence and other conditions. What would be thought of the State of Maine if the same condition of things existed there? In the State of Maine from 1870 to 1880 the population increased only 3 per cent., while that of the Maritime Provinces of Canada increased 13 or 14 per cent. Yet the newspapers in the State of Maine do not discuss their future as those in Canada do. They do not say we are progressing so slowly that we must change our political connections. Some people say why not compare the whole of the United States with Canada? Because it would not be fair, and the man who would do so must be ignorant or scarcely honest. You might as well compare Scotland with England. Maine would have some reason for discussing the question of secession, but that State never does so, and why? Because the country discussed the question, and when one State or a cluster of States raised the question the whole country put its foot upon it. The civil war in the United States settled the question and decided that the separate States had no right to secede. In Canada we call secession independence, but independence means that we are to be no longer British subjects. You may say that the connecting links between Canada and Great Britain are not very strong. I do not agree with that but will not argue the point. But in Canada we go farther than discuss secession. Suppose the State of Texas were to propose annexation to Mexico. They would not only be seceding but they would be suiciding in blotting out the name of the State of Texas from history. However, I am not denying the right of secession, but when a people are always talking secession there is something wrong about their stability as a people, and there must be something wrong in Canada. What is it? Is it or is it no the fact that the people of Canada have not share in the supreme duty of self government? At present we have not. Can that state of things be continued? If we do not respect ourselves, who will respect us? It is not our fault that we are without our supreme right and duty of self-government, but the question will be settled. It cannot be put down. The young men of Canada will not be satisfied with a permanent condition as at present. My second question is this: "What is the cause that Canada is not in that condition of stable equilibrium that every well-governed State is?" The cause is that the condition of a colony is not at first one of full citizenship. At first we in Canada were wholly dependent upon the mother country, but we have made vast strides in national life. It is only half a century since Lord Durham made his famous report recommending that Canada be given the right to manage her own local affairs. In twenty-one years we have become a consolidated country and we have made great progress. And we will settle every home question that comes up. When great questions come up some people say, "Oh, don't touch that question, or you'll smash the Confederation.' Nonsense. We will settle every home question and strengthen the Confederation. We have done a great deal for the mother country in the last twenty-one years, and without a cent of expense to that country. We have advantages in being part of the British nation too, for it is a great deal for us to be able to say to our sons that they can study in Canada for positions in any part of the British Empire, and are not only Canadians but British subjects. We have constructed a great canal system, a great railway system and have opened up our Northwest, thus doing great imperial work. Years ago Mr. Blake advocated a closer connection of the Provinces with the British Empire, but now he says the scheme was received coldly then and would be impossible now. I don't think it is impossible, because any man does not see the possibility. Events are wiser than men and events make that which seems impossible quite possible. If the principle was right years ago it is right now. Our principle is that the union between Great Britain and her colonies must be preserved. I have shown you the cause of our unrest and uncertainty as to the future. Now I will ask you what is the cure? Full citizenship—that's the cure. Because that's the point we have been looking forward to all along. What has been urged in connection with every reform that has been advocated in Canada? That every reform would make us more loyal to Great Britain because it was in accord with the spirit of the British constitution. Is all our work of fifty years, which has made us more loyal to Britain, to be used to bring about secession? No. That would not be evolution, and I believe in evolution. It would be in the direction of destruction instead of advancement. I say this is the only cure for our uncertain feeling as to the future—Imperial Federation. Some people say there is another way—by annexing with the United States and separating from Great Britain, but ultimately joining again with Great Britain in one great British nation. I don't like that, because it doesn't seem right to separate for the sake of forming a stronger union, or to draw all a man's blood from him for the sake of making him stronger. Colonies have been compared to apples falling from the tree. I don't like the comparison, but would rather compare colonies to children, for as children grow up they strengthen the parent. Some say that when a man grows up he should have a household of his own, and therefore argue for secession. Well, I do think that a young man should have his own independent household, but if the parents have accumulated great inheritances and influence, is there any reason why the children should not form an honorable partnership? Canada could not live within itself nor could Canada defend herself as an independent nation, but the empire united could live and prosper within itself and so defend itself that no power could attack it, nor would the empire attack any other. It would bring about a reign of peace. Some men would have us begin with Commercial Union, which, I believe, means disunion. This is our country and the United States is another country, and are we to separate ourselves from our mother country in order to unite with another? It would be unjust to discriminate against England in favor of the United States, and Commercial Union, I think, would be discriminating against our own friends, our country and our Queen. Then Commercial Union is impossible, because it would rob us of our fiscal independence, and we would not get the fancied commercial advantages without political union. Canadians want the greatest amount of free trade with the United States possible, but the man who believes we can get it without paying the price of our fiscal and political independence is, I think, mistaken. We want full citizenship, but we would have to pay a price for it. Since we got our rights of self-government we have run up a public debt of $300,000,000, I think—that is the price we have paid for our freedom. If we had secession we would have to pay for it, and if we had annexation we would have to pay as well. Of course there are difficulties in the way of Imperial Federation, but as Hon. Oliver Mowat has said, what are statesmen for, but to overcome difficulties. What is implied in full citizenship in addition to our present rights? We would have war, peace and treaty making rights, that is, we would have representatives from the self-governing colonies in the Imperial Council. Another plank of the Imperial Federation platform is that Britain should discriminate in favor of her colonies in trade matters. Some people say that Britain would not consent to such a thing, but I believe she would; at any rate she has never been asked. She should be asked to give such advantages, because it would be an advantage to the whole empire. Carry the points I mention and we would no longer be a dependency of Great Britain, and Great Britain would no longer be a little strip of land in the Atlantic. I would go in for the closest trade relations between the colonies and between the colonies and Great Britain. We find that the Irish-Canadians are not so much in favor of Imperial Federation as the Scotch or English. If I were an Irishman I would be more in favor of it than I am, for the quickest way to convert England and the North of Ireland to the Home Rule theory is to convince them that Home Rule would not endanger the unity of the nation. I know of nothing but Imperial Federation that will accomplish Home Rule for Ireland. I am not opposed to sentiment in this matter and I could not bring myself to willingness to have Canada cut off from the past history of Britain. I want to be a part of that nation. If there is one thing that makes me proud of being a Canadian it is that in being so I am a Briton. Principal Grant occupied the platform for an hour and three-quarters, and closed his remarks by a very eloquent peroration.

It was moved by Mr. Edward Martin, seconded by Mr. F. W. Fearman, That, in order to secure the unity and defence of the Empire, some system of federation or co-operation is expedient.

TAFFY FOR HAMILTON.

Mr. D'Alton McCarthy, upon arising to speak to the resolution, was received with enthusiastic cheering. He said he had come to Hamilton to hear Principal Grant, not to make a speech himself. Five years ago, he said, he was present at a meeting in London, England, when the Imperial Federation League was formed. He took no part in it at that time. Three years ago the league was organized in Canada. He had felt doubtful of its success, even when Montreal, Toronto, Brantford and Kingston took it up, unless the movement had the support of the level-headed people of Hamilton. Separation of Canada from Britain could not be accomplished until all Canada arose as one man and demanded it, which would never happen as long as the people of Canada were sane and Britain used them justly. When the league was organized in Hamilton he hoped he would have the privilege of returning to Hamilton to address the people.

It was moved by Mr. George H. Mills, seconded by Mr. F. MacKelcan, That in the opinion of this meeting it is desirable to form a branch of the Imperial Federation League of Canada in Hamilton.

Mr. Geo. M. Barton at this point arose and asked if this movement was the small end of the wedge by which it was proposed to destroy the National Policy and throw it to the winds. He thought it was not

The motion was put to the meeting and declared carried.

A vote of thanks to Principal Grant and Mr. D'Alton McCarthy was moved by Mr. F. MacKelcan and seconded by Mr. Adam Brown. It was carried unanimously.

In replying to the resolution of thanks, Dr. Grant called upon Dr. Burns to make a few remarks—just to say whether his arguments were sound or not.

Dr. Burns said: Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen,—You have taken an unfair advantage of me to-night. I came to hear my eloquent friend, Principal Grant, and to enjoy a treat, and I have not been disappointed. With the whole spirit of the address I have been delighted, but I did not come to talk. I endorse almost every word of the eloquent address; I call it not an oration, as Mr. Brown has designated it, but an unanswerable argument. The lecturer hinted that my countrymen must show that they desire the integrity of the empire before they are entitled to Home Rule. I have no hesitancy in saying that if Canada had been misgoverned as long as Ireland there would be less loyalty here than in that country; we would not submit to their treatment for a week; we would be less loyal than they are. He also said that Irishmen should favor federation for the sake of securing Home Rule, and that Home Rule could come only through federation. Some of this audience may remember that in my first lecture in this very house on Home Rule I advocated self-government for each part of the empire, with an Imperial Parliament for Imperial matters, and I said, "That would be the beginning of Federation which is now looming up and destined soon to be an accomplished fact." I believe in the free intercourse of the different parts of our immense empire. No one can be acquainted with the development of the great republic on our southern borders without seeing what real federation can do. There are 40 States, and there will soon be more, with every variety of climate and product, and the product of each State welcomed to the market of every other. The grandest illustration of free trade that the world has ever seen under such a system of federation is natural. I admired the golden cord of free trade that ran all through the lecture, and I am sure that in the composition of the eloquent lecturer, both warp and woof are made up of the same generous principle. Why should there be any restrictions on the intercourse of the children of the same mother? I would favor the federation of the British possessions, but I would go farther, and I am sure that the lecturer would go with me. I would have a federation of the English speaking peoples. Nor would I stop there. I would aim at the federation of the race. A federation of the English speaking nations could dictate to the world and shape the civilization of the age. The lecturer was right when he spoke of the difficulty of covering the subject in one lecture. Principal Grant must return, and Mr. McCarthy will still have plenty to do. The subject is immense. Britain's possessions abroad are 65 times the area of the United Kingdom Abroad she is nearly 8,000,000 square miles, at home she is only about 121,000. Her flag covers a foreign population seven or eight times that of the United Kingdom. Her tonnage at home is more than equal to that of all her foreign possessions, while her debt is more than twice theirs combined. The subject is indeed immense and difficulties may be expected. Shall this federation be like an alliance, offensive and defensive, embracing army and navy? An analysis of the income and expenditure of Great Britain will show us that an average of over sixteen shillings in the pound, or over four-fifths of all taxation, is spent on war, leaving less than four shillings for all other purposes. Spite of our debts and extravagances, that presents a fearful contrast to the war taxation of our peaceful Province so favorably pictured to-night. Most of the foreign possessions are Crown colonies whose policy is directed by Downing street. But to the most important ones enlarged liberties have been given, and these liberties have been used by some of them to adopt a policy contrary to that of the mother country. Canada and most of the Australian colonies insist on protection. I don't present these as insuperable difficulties, but only as some that must be removed, and I would like to see them removed. Before taking my seat I would express my warmest admiration for the generous and manly spirit that pervaded the whole lecture. Such a discussion must do us all good.

A vote of thanks was tendered Mayor Doran and the meeting adjourned.

DRUGGIST WOOD BROUGHT BACK.

The Alleged Murderer of Lily Charlton Comes Back Voluntarily.

At an early hour this (Saturday) morning, John Wood, druggist, Toronto, charged with murdering Lily Charlton in Toronto, was taken to the police station there in charge of Detective Cuddy. He consented to leave Buffalo without formal extradition proceedings. He had eluded the warrants out for his arrest ever since his sudden departure to the States when the crime leaked out. The prisoner strode up to the sergeant with his hands behind his back, simulating by his manner and voice a masterly indifference to the position in which he is placed.

Wood replied as follows to questions put by the reporter: "I have simply to state," said Wood, "that I came back here of my own free will, believing that, as I am an innocent man, the law will have no hold upon me. The first I knew of the case was when Dr. Valentine requested me to telephone for Dr. Strange to attend his patient. I did so in the ordinary way. Do you suppose if I had been in any way implicated that I would have put the case in the hands of a strange doctor when discovery must have been certain? Well, not much. I was quite innocent of the whole affair. Why did I run away to Buffalo? Well, I simply went because my doctor advised me to go away to some place for the benefit of my health."

"Were you in a state of decline when you left?" ventured the reporter.

"Well, I should say so. My stock had gone down about 1,500 per cent. Now that you ask me, I will tell you why I did not come back before. I fell from a buggy at Buffalo last December and broke my hip and am only recovering now. I opened in business for myself in Buffalo about seven weeks ago, and have been living since quite openly with my wife and family over the store, which is situated on Erie street. Yes, I expect bail; I have received a promise—no matter from whom—that I shall be bailed out in the morning, and that it will be fixed at less than $2,000. Why should I have to put up more? Valentine was only required to give $1,500."

Little Sisters.

BY KATE THORN.

Little sisters are a great trial to the young lady with her first beau.

They have such a deadly habit of telling just the secrets that their big sister wouldn't have known for the world, and telling them at just the very worst times they could possibly select. And, what is more, they seem to take a malicious pleasure in telling them

If Mary Jane has kept her hair rolled up for two days to be well frizzed when Augustus calls, her little sister will note the proceeding, and just as Mary Jane has assured her admiring swain that her hair curls naturally, and that it is almost impossible to make it stay anywhere, up will pop the small sister and tell the whole story of the curl-papers, and in all probability she will add the information that Mary Jane puts red ink on her cheeks to make her "pritty."

Little sisters are always cropping out at the wrong time. They never want to go to bed the nights when the big sister's beau is expected, and no amount of coaxing and candy can convince them that they are sleepy.

They have eyes for everything and ears that would detect the slightest whisper. And next day, at the dinner-table, the big sister will be mortified to death, and the whole family will be thrown into convulsions by the piping announcement from the small sister:

"Gus Jones bit our Mary Jane last night right into the mouth! I seen him! And she bit him back

Little sisters always want to know all the whys and the wherefores. One of them is likely to climb on the knee of an aspiring young gentleman suitor, and ask him why he doesn't have more hairs in his moustache; she would like to ask him if he doesn't feel bad because his nose is long, and it would delight her dear little heart to impart to him the fact that Mary Brown and sister Jane both said he was too long-legged for anything but a greyhound.

Small sisters will tell the family secrets with most delightful candor, and while the young gentleman caller is waiting for the young lady of the family to give the final touches to her toilet before coming down, the small sister will confidentially make him acquainted with the fact that "papa swears at mamma right along," and that "we have old hen for dinner and call it chicken-pie," and that "sister Jane wants to get married awfully to some rich young fool who will keep her without work."

Little sisters will put molasses candy in the chair, and see you sit down on it without a word of warning; they will wipe their bread and butter hands on your pantaloons; they will cradle their kittens in your $6 hat; they will pin you and your inamorata to the chairs; they will put burrs in your hair; they will sift sawdust from the cracked bodies of their dolls down the back of your neck; and they will make faces at you, and yell like little demons, if you attempt to defend yourself.

Therefore we say to you, if possible, avoid going courting in families where there are little sisters, unless you are so deeply in love as to be perfectly indifferent and reckless as to the consequences.

NICE ENDING TO DOMESTIC SCANDAL

A Repentant Wife Returns to the Arms of a Forgiving Husband.

The following from an Otterville correspondent of the Woodstock Sentinel-Review will recall to the minds of many of our readers an interesting story of domestic trial. The plotted elopement of Mrs. Kenny and John Venner, the failure of John Venner to connect, his subsequent arrest and imprisonment, and the dramatic scene in the Court-house at the trial, are incidents that merely need mentioning. Mrs. Kenny, it will be remembered, proceeded to England, where she had some friends. The husband (Oliver Kenny) appeared inconsolable at the time for the loss of his children and the breaking up of his home: but time is a marvellous magician. It fills many a void and heals many a wound. The happiest chapter in the little social drama is told by an Otterville correspondent as follows:

Amid the ringing of bells and happy greetings, Mrs. Bessie Kenny alighted from the train on Monday evening. She soon found herself in the fond embrace of a loving and forgiving husband who had mourned her as lost. Oliver is now happy and things are moving along majestically. Bessie and the children are all well, but they are so tanned by crossing the Atlantic that you would hardly know their faces from a side of sole leather.

Among the Poultry.

Just at night is the best time to set hens.

Sulphur is not good to give the young chickens.

Kerosene and lard make a good ointment for scaly legs.

After the chickens are two or three weeks old they can be fed on cracked wheat.

If the eggs are to be hatched keep a drake for every five ducks in order to be sure.

Never keep a slop hole where the poultry can help themselves if you expect to maintain health.

One advantage with ducks is that they do not harbor lice. They have too much oil.

Old pieces of oil cloth can be used to good advantage as a covering for coops in rainy weather

One advantage with Pekin ducks is that only a low fence is needed to confine or keep them out.

On the farm the laying of five dozen eggs ought to pay for keeping a hen a year. All above this is profit. On the farm it will nearly always pay to plant a few rows of sunflower seed especially for the poultry. Geese are fond of weeds, especially of purslane, and will often do good service in killing out and destroying weeds. Very often a few drops of turpentine put in the drinking water at this time will prevent the gapes. If the chicks are already affected, a drop or two on a small piece of bread will cure. As a rule guineas should be hatched under hens near the house. They are naturally rather wild, and this will aid materially in making them gentle if the young guineas are kept near the house.

Milk is much better food for poultry during the summer than corn. Corn is heating and fattening, two conditions that, as a rule, ought to be avoided, unless feeding for market.

The value of the manure should always be considered in keeping poultry properly managed. It is one of the best fertilizers that can be had, and is well worth the trouble of gathering up and storing until ready for use.

Mr. Jos. Blackburn has placed a new and handsome fence around his lot and planted a nice row of shade trees along its fronts.

Flattering, but True.

This village is now in its prime. Vegetation is far advanced, the trees are in full leaf, and when such is the case everyone who has seen Flesherton knows that it is the handsomest spot in Canada. It will be handsomer, too. A large amount of tree planting and improving of lots has been done this spring. Flesherton is one of the prettiest, most law-abiding villages in the world, and many a traveler has said that for a pleasant place to live and bring up a family in he could wish for no spot more suitable. Such was the verdict of a traveler only the other day in conversation with The Advance.

Sudden Death

The Messrs. Hawk Bros., egg merchants, of Flesherton, were suddenly called away to Berlin on Friday last by a telegram announcing the sudden death of their father, who had been ailing for some time, but nothing so serious had been anticipated. An operation had been performed upon him a few days previously, and it was thought that he was recovering nicely, but the case took a sudden turn for the worse with the above result. Deceased was about 65 years of age.

A Swindle.

Flesherton has been flooded with circulars during the past week or so from a Chicago Portrait Company offering to make a crayon portrait of yourself worth $30 without payment and without price, the only condition offered being that you will show the picture to your friends. The Pickering News says it is a huge swindle. It says that the company will inform you when the picture is completed and request you to send $3 to put a magnificent frame around it for safe carriage, etc. The money once sent is irrecoverable, and the firm is never again heard from. Keep your dollars at home.

It is necessary that you mention this paper in sending for the "Treatise." This offer will remain open for only a short time.

A Happy Seizure

On Thursday afternoon of last week one of those pleasant affairs which always has a halo of interest surrounding it took place at the residence of Thos. Leitch, Esq., Flesherton. The occasion was the marriage of Mr. Leitch's youngest daughter, Alice, to Mr. Wm. H. Moore, son of Sheriff Moore of Owen Sound. The interesting ceremony was performed by Rev. R. H. Leitch, brother of the bride, assisted by Rev. J. W. Shilton. The bridesmaids were Miss Jennie Moore and Miss May Damude, and the groom was supported by Mr. Wismer Joyce and Mr. Walter Leitch. A beautiful repast was provided after the ceremony. Some of those present were: Sheriff and Mrs. Moore; Captain Snyder, of Toronto, uncle of the groom; Miss Brown of Collingwood, and a large number of near relatives and friends. The presents were numerous, handsome and useful. The happy couple left by the evening train for their future home in Owen Sound. It was a rather strange coincidence that the ministers who performed the ceremony were both born on the same day of the same year.

Church Parade

No. 6 company of volunteers, headed by Flesherton brass band, paraded from the drill shed to the Methodist Church Sunday evening last, when Rev. Mr. Shilton preached a grand sermon from First Timothy, 6 and 12: "Fight the good fight of Faith." These, he said, were the words of a soldier. It was the story of Saul, who, arrested in his journey to Damascus, had enlisted in the army of Christ, and his was a warfare filled with suffering and stripes. Faith was the great battle ground that began with life and ended only in death. The speaker dwelt at length upon the life of Paul and his magnificent victories. The old soldier had spoken of his fights with beasts at Ephesus. The speaker thought he referred to spiritual sufferings. When he (the preacher) had joined the volunteer company he was required to take the oath of service. When enlisting under the banner of Christ the same covenant was taken. He had at the time of joining the volunteers written to Col. Otter for a drill guide, and studied it assiduously, thereby acquiring an advantage that his fellows did not have who were not possessed of the book. The Bible was the Christian's drill book, and only those who studied it well could make good soldiers. The speaker laid particular stress upon the truth that "the man who takes Christ with him, all other things being equal, will make the greatest success," and instanced several cases in point. The Duke of Wellington—hero of a hundred battles—was enabled to overcome his great enemy because he acknowledged a higher power. Keppler and Newton took Christ with them in their daily walk. Obedience to superiors was the soldier's requisite. In the smoke of battle the great eye of God was upon us, and we could hear his command from the distance. Our duty was only to obey. Look at the 600 at Balaclava.

The [illegible] make reply,
[illegible] reason why,
[illegible] do and die.

Courage was required. It was said that on the eve of the battle of Waterloo recruits were placed alternately beside the veterans to give them courage. This was also done in the church. The soldier when asked after the battle of Waterloo if he was not afraid, replied: "I never thought of being discouraged, for I knew we were going to win." That was the proper sentiment. Mr. Shilton concluded an eloquent address by inviting his hearers to enlist in the army of Christ.

The church was crowded to the doors. The company did not turn out in great force.

Flesherton Brass Band discoursed excellent music by the way.

The lamps were not lit in the church, and during the singing of the last hymn only those who were acquainted with the words could take part.

The choir has improved very much of late and rendered their pieces very creditably.

The Jesuits at Rocklyn.

By our own Reporter.

The public meeting held at Rocklyn on Tuesday of last week was very largely attended. There were on the platform the following gentlemen: Thos. Kells, Esq., president of the Conservative Association; W. McLaughrey, Sec.; Dr. Sproule, M. P., Joseph Rorke, M.P.P., Thos. Gilray, reeve of Euphrasia; Mr. Smelser, reeve of Collingwood; Robert Myles, Esq., Andrew Grier, Neil McColman, ex M.P.P., Rev. Mr. McClaren, Rev. Mr. Wilkinson and others whose names your reporter could not ascertain. The Town Hall was crowded to its utmost, and some were standing at the door. Thos. Kells occupied the chair and gave a short opening address. He does not censure the government for their vote on the Jesuit Estate Bill, but thinks that under the circumstances they could not do otherwise.

Dr. Sproule was the next speaker on the list and as the meeting was called for the purpose of giving the Dr. a chance to explain to the people his reasons for voting for the allowance of the Jesuit Estate Bill, he occupied most of the time, speaking almost two hours. He reviewed the government of the country almost from the time of confederation, and dealt very ably with many questions of interest, but especially with the Jesuits. He said it was lawful for the Jesuits to have this money although he did not like the law and much less the Jesuits and so he voted to the best of his knowledge. Another reason, he said, was, at the time that Colonel O'Brien introduced the bill, if the Government had supported the bill and lost it the house would have been dissolved and Mr. Laurier would have been called upon to choose a cabinet and form a government, and he did not think the country would be any better under the leadership of Mr. Laurier, or not as good, as it is at the present time. Therefore he thought he was justified in voting the way he did.

The next speaker on the list was Rev. Mr. McClaren. He had only a few minutes to speak and therefore he could not go into the question fully. He censures the 188 very hard and thinks the time has come when the people will have to throw aside Grit and Tory partyism and stand for religious liberty. He was loudly cheered as he sat down.

Joseph Rorke was the next speaker, but did not occupy much time. He also is not in accordance with the 188. He could not see that the Jesuits had any claim on the property. Mr. Rorke had to regret that time would not permit him to go into the question more fully. He also was applauded loudly as he took his seat.

Neil McColman ex-M.P.P., then took the platform, but limited his address to a few remarks. He thought the question pertaining to the Jesuits had been discussed fully, and therefore did not deem it necessary to say much on it.

He views the [illegible] 188 calmly, and thinks [illegible] at least should get [illegible] they thought best for the country.

Andrew Grier, Robert Myles and P. McCullough, Beq., [illegible] few questions at the close of the meeting. The meeting [illegible] o'clock with rounds of cheers.

SOME CANADIAN SCENERY.

A Beautiful Valley—The Fishing Islands of Lake Huron.

That Ontario possesses some bits of landscape as pretty as can be found in the world is the verdict of travelers who know of what they are talking. The Advance has decided to write up a few sketches of pastoral and other scenes, which it ventures to hope will be found of some interest to its readers; some of whom, however, may have viewed for themselves the scenes we depict, but if so they will probably find them pleasant to recall, and can compare their own impressions with ours. We would be happy to receive other sketches from those of our readers who have anything suitable in their mind's eye and are willing to place them upon paper. To begin with, and very near home, we will notice

THE QUEEN'S VALLEY.

This beautiful vale lies directly north of Flesherton, with its termination, or head proper, about two miles distant. It is one of the most picturesque pastoral scenes in the world. It has not the sublime beauty of some Scottish glens, nor the towering surroundings of Rocky Mountain gorges, but takes in a wide landscape, beautiful in outline, suffused in tints of green, and exceeding restful and pleasing to the eye. From whatever point it is approached the view is superb, and will linger long in the memory of the traveler who sees it for the first and last time. Perhaps one of the prettiest views is that obtainable on the road from Eugenia to Kimberley, where it begins to descend; and the most favorable season of year is when the golden fields of grain, waving in its fertile depths, are checkered off into blocks alternating with patches of emerald woodland. The view extends here for eight miles to the north from hill to hill. At your left the valley is probably two miles across, from 700 to 800 feet in depth, and descends quite abruptly. Cultivated farms of great fertility line its sides and slumber in its depths. The Beaver river winds through its bottom lands and forms the angler's haven of bliss. At the bottom of the valley due north lies the little village of Kimberley, nestling below craggy rocks that rise on the east to a great height, and from the top of which, also, is obtained a most awe-inspiring view. The Queen's Valley, from its southern extremity to Thornbury, where it meets the Georgian Bay, is fully 22 miles long, and forms one of the most fertile strips of farming land in this whole Dominion. It is noted for its salubrious climate and healthy atmosphere. Kimberley, ten miles from Flesherton, is a growing and prosperous little village. The beautiful Queen's Valley is associated with our earliest recollections, and will remain with us to the end of life as a scene the beauties of which cannot be faithfully depicted upon paper or canvas. The pen seems too weak, and the painter's brush could only show bits here and there, whereas it requires the whole to make up this perfect picture.

THE FISHING ISLANDS.

On the eastern shore of Lake Huron, seven miles due west from Wiarton, on the Bruce peninsula, lie the Fishing Islands. They are easily found on any good map of Ontario. These islands lie in great number for a distance of six miles along the coast, and in a line distant from the shore of a quarter to two miles. The small village of Oliphant is situated on a bluff which formed at some period in past ages the shore line, but from which the water has now receded a hundred yards or more. The lake bottom at this point is of sand, level and hard, and the water is shallow for a long distance out towards the islands. This beautiful sandy bottom, at the present season of year, forms an extensive spawning-bed for innumerable black bass, which, a little later in the season, may be caught in large quantities with rod and line. Herring in shoals come inside the islands and disport themselves in shallow water. Salmon and pickerel inhabit the deeper waters, and an occasional sturgeon is captured. The islands are mostly small, but all have local cognomens, and on Main Station Island is a good wharf, stone house where supplies are kept, and several fishermen's residences. At least such was its condition when we visited the spot a few years ago. Other appropriate names are given to the smaller islands, such as "Bellmore's," "Smokehouse," "Squaw," "Whitefish," etc. These islands are all rocky, and are mostly covered with thin soil and a stunted undergrowth. They form a coast defence from the heavy storms which rage on the bosom of Lake Huron during the stormy seasons, such as only nature can supply, and the mountain waves from the west break in wild foam upon their rocks, while the inner waters are but slightly agitated. Years ago the inhabitants gained a considerable portion of their livelihood from wreckage washed ashore from unfortunate vessels. Many a barrel of flour and pork have been rescued from these waters to be added to the old settlers' frugal fare of fish and potatoes. And not infrequently, also, has the horrified wrecker discovered a ghastly floating remnant of humanity washed landward by the waves. Many an unmarked grave lies along this shore, the nameless occupant perhaps mourned for in some distant home, where wife, or parents, or brothers, or sisters, are dwelling in ignorance of the fact that the lost one has received a christian burial. On Whitefish Island stands a high, solitary cedar tree. It is trimmed of all branches nearly to the top, and pegs are driven into it at regular intervals up the trunk, forming a rude living ladder. The object of this ladder was a curiosity until we learned that it formed a lookout for enterprising fishermen who used it for the purpose of discovering the whereabouts of whitefish shoals, when they would draw a seine around the fish and haul them ashore. The islands are mostly used by fishermen for the curing of fish. They will probably remain as nature made them to a great extent, as the harbor is very shallow and the situation not good for a business centre. They would form very pleasant retreats for men of leisure to pass the hot summer months upon, indeed we can think of no more inviting a spot for such a purpose. The air is nearly always cool, with a soft breeze blowing, which whispers dolce far niente to the idler on these islets. In fancy even as we write can be heard the soft plash of the waves as they kiss the pebbled shore, and we can still see the white-winged fishing boats as they skim over the clear, cool waters.

Maxwell

From our own Correspondent.

On Wednesday evening, May 15th, the people of Maxwell and vicinity were surprised to hear of the marriage of Mr. John Graham to a young lady of Collingwood. The ceremony took place at the residence of Mr. Graham about nine o'clock p.m. On Thursday evening they were serenaded by the boys.

Mr. J. Reid is shipping lumber to Toronto Junction for the purpose of building a number of houses, operation to commence about the 1st of June.

Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Fenwick are visiting friends about Maxwell. They look well and seem pleased to be back after an absence of six years.

Miss A. Horton, of Chicago, is visiting at Mr. Wm. Horton's.

Mr. J. Carr's stock of dry goods and groceries has been purchased by Mr. C. Mc. D. Williams who had it moved into his own store.

Mr. R. M. Heron left for Collingwood last week, where he intends staying all summer.

The 24th will be celebrated in Maxwell. The bills say we are to have a grand time.

Carter's two lambs, calf and dam, have been sold to Messrs. Cross & Lynn for $1000 cash. Since accepting that he has had others as high as $1800. On Saturday 165 went to see them, on Sunday it was a perfect stream, but only a few were accorded the privilege. Manager Hill, of the Toronto Industrial, was one of the Sunday visitors. Monday a charge of 25 cents was made, but the visitors did not let up. What Messrs. Cross & Lynn intend doing with the freaks we have not heard.—[Beeton World.

THE "TIMES" COMMISSION.

Close of Parnell's Examination—Archbishop Walsh on the Stand.

A last (Wednesday) night's London cable says: Mr. Parnell's examination was finished before the Commission to-day. He testified that the Reception Committee in America comprised the leading merchants of New York, representative citizens and ministers of religion. In his speeches in New York, witness declared that not a farthing contributed to the Irish cause would go towards organizing rebellion in Ireland. Throughout his tour of the United States he had never even swerved a hand's breadth from that declaration. Attorney-General Webster, the witness said, had quoted from five out of sixty speeches he had made in the United States, ignoring the general tenor of his speeches, so as to misrepresent his words. All the names the Attorney-General had mentioned of persons associated with the meetings were only a small fraction of those who attended. Men of prominent positions and undoubted respectability attended these meetings. In no sense could the American reception be identified with the proceedings of the Physical Force Party. Witness firmly believed that none of his colleagues, since joining the Irish Parliamentary party, had had anything to do with the Fenians. Only casually did the Fenians come within the orbit of the constitutional movement. Here Mr. Parnell scored by remarking that the Tories were more certainly associated with the movement; for instance, when they co-operated with the Parnellites to obstruct the Criminal Code Bill to the death.

Referring to some letters of his, Mr. Parnell said he had copies made from his secretary's shorthand notes.

Attorney-General Webster—It seems that there exists a book of Mr. Parnell's letters. I would like to see that book.

Sir Charles Russell—By all means.

Presiding Justice Hannen—If these letters refer to the League they ought to have been disclosed.

Mr. Parnell—Your Lordships are welcome to see any letter I ever wrote or received.

Attorney-General Webster, recurring to Mr. Parnell's private bank account, wanted to trace a number of cheques.

A warm discussion ensued, Sir Charles Russell declaring that such action would be unfair.

Justice Hannen suggested a postponment of the matter until fuller documents were before the court.

Archbishop Walsh testified that he came to the conclusion before 1879 that there was need of a defensive land organization, and was proceeding to give his opinion on the subject.

Justice Hannen said the inquiry must be limited to whether or not the Land League was necessary.

Attorney-General Webster submitted that matters of opinion were not admissible.

Mr. Biggar urged that opinion evidence had been given over and over again by "hirelings" of the Government.

Justice Hannen warned Mr. Biggar not to use such expressions.

Mr. Biggar said that unless such evidence was admitted the whole inquiry would end in a farce.

The judges retired to consider the matter privately. On their return Justice Hannen announced they had decided that it was not permissible to ask any witness, however distinguished, abstract questions of opinion. The facts known to the witness ought to be laid before the court before opinions based thereon were mentioned.

The Archbishop, continuing, said that in the course of his visits through his diocese he had abundant means of knowing that the League denounced outrages. Many priests had joined the League with his approval. He saw nothing in the action of the League to forbid the clergy joining.

A TRIO OF SUICIDES.

Three Unfortunates Shuffle off this Mortal Coil.

Joseph Arcand Stremi committed suicide yesterday morning at St. Philippo, Laprairie County, Que., by hanging himself in a shed. Deceased was a middle-aged man, lately married.

It is stated, on what appears to be good authority, that P. B. Douglas, late Assistant Secretary of the Department of the Interior, Ottawa, committed suicide by cutting his throat with a razor.

A deliberate case of suicide occurred in Montreal on Thursday evening. A butcher called George Lussier, residing on St. Catharine street, was threatened with prosecution for keeping a stall without a license. Being involved in financial difficulties at the same time, the trouble so preyed upon his mind that yesterday he attempted to throw himself under a Canadian Pacific Railway train, but was prevented from doing so by the vigilance of the officials. He then proceeded to Monarque street and deliberately threw himself into the St. Lawrence. He rose to the surface and was heard to cry for assistance, bht the current being very strong the unfortunate man was gradually borne away, and was soon seen to sink to rise no more.

Hereafter the boats to be carried by Atlantic steamers, instead of being made of wood, will be made of steel, in one piece. Wooden boats rot and are easily crushed. The new boats will be built by machinery especially made for rolling them out in all sizes in a single plate.

Perhaps the secret egrets of life are the weightiest, and chiefly on this account—that they are incommunicable.

"I MUST HAVE HELP!"

Deluded Mrs. Fox Dies in Agony Under the Care of a Faith Healer.

A Syracuse despatch says: The funeral of Mrs. Royal E. Fox took place at her home, No. 30 Erie street, this afternoon. To-morrow the remains will be buried in Oswego. Mrs. Fox died the day before yesterday. The responsibility for the fatal termination of her illness is laid by public opinion at the door of what is called Christian science. Mrs. Fox had been subject to bilious attacks for several years. When the first one came on Dr. Jay W. Sheldon was called. When the patient had begun to recover she was left to the charge of Dr. E. H. Flint. Mrs. Fox was to some extent a believer in Christian science at that time, and her husband was, as he is yet, "very firm in the faith," to quote an expression used to-day by one of the friends of the family. During a recurrence of her illness some weeks ago Mrs. Fox relied entirely upon Christian science, Mrs. E. P. Bates attending her, and she got better. She was told then that having once been cured by Christian science she would be free from the malady thereafter, and she entirely believed it.

FAITH CURE DID NOT HELP HER.

Last Saturday the disease came on again with unusual severity. Mrs. Bates was out of town, and another apostle of Christian science, Mrs. Norris, was called. Mrs. Fox's daughters urged that a physician be called, but their entreaties went for nothing. Mr. Fox had unbounded confidence in Christian science of a curative power and felt sure his wife would again recover. The patient, it is said, suffered terribly, and frequently called out in her agony, "I must have help! I must have help!" She was told that all she needed was courage, and she would be sure to triumph over the malady. Mrs. Fox took scarcely any nourishment during the attack. Dr. Flint was summoned at the last moment.

A DOCTOR CALLED TOO LATE.

"When I entered the house," he said to-day, "Mrs. Fox had just passed away. The body was still warm, but there were no signs of life. I was called to make out the death certificate, I suppose. I assigned as the cause of death inflammation of the liver."

Dr. Flint expressed the opinion that if Mrs. Fox had been allowed her own way she would have had the services of a physician. One of the neighbors said that the body immediately after death was "all twisted up," its position leading her to believe that Mrs. Fox was writhing in agony when she died.

HE KILLED HIMSELF.

A Young Man Puts Up at a Hotel and Shoots Himself.

A Detroit despatch says: On Wednesday evening a nicely dressed man, apparently 20 years old, took room 78, third floor, Russell House, registering as D. E. Cady, of Auburn, N.Y. He had no baggage, and paid for one day in advance. Meals were served in his room. On Thursday morning he came downstairs and told the clerk he would stay another day, and paid for it. Friday morning one of the employees called Mr. McCleary's attention to the fact that no meals had been sent to the room since Thursday noon. The door of the room was locked, and no response was made from within to the rapping. A ladder was procured, and through the transom the lifeless form of the young man, fully dressed, was seen lying on the bed in a pool of blood. The door was forced open and it was found that Cady had been dead some time. His legs were crossed and his arms folded on his breast. His right hand clutched a self-acting revolver, with which he had shot himself in the head over the right ear. On the centre table was an envelope addressed to the proprietor of the Russell House, containing a note with these words: "Please notify Charles Cady, Auburn, N.Y., Cayuga county, if anything happens to me."

Lonsdale Spinning Yarns.

A Winnipeg despatch says: Lord Lonsdale says it was with the greatest difficulty that the Indians could be persuaded to go north, as they were terribly afraid of the Esquimaux, who up there are called "Huskeys," and instead of being short of stature stand six feet in height. When Lord Lonsdale arrived among them they made a half-circle as he advanced, each of the natives holding in his hand a knife about six inches long. Against the advice of his interpreter he went into their chasm snow house, where meetings were held. The natives informed the interpreter that they had heard that all white men were brave, and they were going to try them. The braves then formed in line before Lord Lonsdale as he sat on a box, and each drawing his knife rushed upon him ready to strike. They stopped at his feet, and the leader, advancing, put his ear over the explorer's heart and listened to its beating. Lord Lonsdale took no notice, but asked to see them dance. During the progress of the dance the braves would stop and rush at the white man with their knives upraised. Fortunately his nerve did not fail him, and he was afterwards received with every mark of consideration.

T. Granger Stewart, M. D., F. R. S. E., ordinary physician to H. M. the Queen in Scotland, Professor of Practice of Physic in the University of Edinburgh, writes of Bright's disease as follows: "Catarrh of the intestine also occasionally occurs, sometimes producing an exhausting diarrhœa." Warner's Safe Cure cures the diarrhœa by first removing the cause.

TELEGRAPHIC SUMMARY.

The attendance at the Paris Exposition has thus far averaged 71,000 persons daily.

It is reported that Sir Charles Russell's fee for acting as counsel for the Parnellites is $10,000.

A landlord has been arrested in Kingston charged with evicting a tenant at the point of a revolver.

Rev. Mr. Evans, Church of England clergyman, of Buckingham, Que., was drowned yesterday while out sailing.

The death is announced of Dr. Alex. Harvey, Emeritus Professor of Materia Medica in the University of Aberdeen.

Work on the Kingston dry-dock was commenced yesterday morning, and it is expected to take two years to complete it.

Miss Kate Sherman, a buxom Tennessee girl, met her father at the depot the other day, and broke two of his ribs at a single hug.

An immense quantity of the plates of the Great Eastern, recently broken up, has been received in Montreal for the iron factories and rolling mills.

Bones were found in the well at Springfield into which it has been rumored a man was thrown seventeen years ago, but whether the bones are human or not remains to be established.

A little boy named Eddie Stansfield, son of Mr. Isaac Stansfield, traveller for R. S. Williams & Co.'s music house, London, was missing on Wednesday and at a late hour last night his body was found in the river.

Von Bulow says that every pianist should learn to sing and play the violin, "as their ears would hear more critically the sounds they produce and thereby teach them how to phrase." Some pianists we have heard should learn to cook and to make shoes—and let the piano alone.—Norristown Herald

The house at West Lorne, St. Thomas, to which the smallpox has been successfully confined by the exertions of the Chairman of the Board of Health, was burned last night, and the Chairman was entertained to supper and presented with a cane.

Thomas Elvert, a demented man, at Tweed, attempted to commit suicide by drowning on Sunday, but was rescued by parties returning from church services. A medical commission pronounced him dangerously insane, and to-day he was committed to the county jail.

Mrs. Maria Elliott, formerly Mrs. O'Flaherty, who has kept the Wellington House, London, for some time, is mourning the loss of a husband and $2 000, especially the latter. Elliott by some means got hold of the money, which was to have been paid on some property, and is now far away from his better half.

Rufus Huntley, a farmer, who formerly lived a short distance from Hanover, left the Queen's Hotel to take the early train yesterday morning for Michigan and was found dead on the sidewalk a short time afterwards. He was taken into Mr. Messinger's house near by, and Coroner Landerkin sent for. A large wound was found across the left cheek, how received is a mystery.

Dr. Cassan, physician to the Hospital of the Insane of the Bon Sauveur, Albi, France, was murdered on Wednesday night. Upon entering his room next morning his attendants found him lying on his bed in his night-shirt. His body was literally covered with knife wounds, and his head nearly separated from the trunk. Dr. Cassan was a quiet man, much respected by all who knew him. He was Maire of Albi under the Empire and during the regime of "Seize Mai."

American visitors fairly rained upon London on Wednesday. The City of New York, the City of Rome and the Trave arrived, landing altogether nearly a thousand Americans. By every possible train these, or a majority of them at least, went to London. Where they all found a roof to cover them is a mystery. The hotels were already full to the sky parlors, and turning away each from a dozen to a hundred a day, but presumably all found a place in which to run up a bill for the necessities and luxuries of life.

White Caps have notified Rev. George Jacob Schweinfurth to leave Rockford, Ill., in ten days. If he does not go they say they will break into his house, take him to the woods, strip him, tar and feather him and roast him alive. They claim he is breaking up families. If any one interferes they will be similarly treated. Schweinfurth has employed a night watchman, purchased guns and dogs, and proposes to be ready for them. Rev. Mr. Schweinfurth is the head of what is known as the Beekmanite sect, and is worshipped by his followers as the Christ.

The estimated expenditure for the current year for the city of Toronto is 14½ mills on the dollar, as against 14¾ last year.

The Mayor of Collingwood yesterday laid the foundation stone of the Marine and General Hospital which it is proposed to build.

A lady interested in the Montreal Boys' Home has handed the Superintendent a cheque for $4,000, to be devoted to building purposes.

The Mayor, Ald. McMillan, Ald. Gillespie and City Treasurer Coady, of Toronto, will visit England on an early date to float city debentures amounting to three million dollars.

The funeral of Count Tolstoi, late Minister of the Interior, took place at St. Petersburg yesterday. The Czar was present. He has donated to the widow 200,000 roubles and granted her a yearly pension of 6,000 roubles.

A gigantic raft, comprising 2,000,000 feet of timber, is now en route from Detroit to Buffalo. The raft reached Detroit late in the fall, when it was thought too risky to let it proceed further. By the time this lumber reaches its destination it will have been over five months on the journey.

Five young men, representing the sporting fraternity, were before the Kingston Police Court yesterday for participating in a cocking main, conducted in an office in the centre of the city. Three were fined $50 and costs and two $25 and costs, with the usual option. It transpired during the trial that a well-known alderman had acted as referee, and he will now be attended to.

Judge Lizars, of Stratford, who has been seriously ill, is much better.

The work of counting the $200,000,000 in the United States Treasury is to be begun at once.

A little lad named Proulx, while playing on the banks of the canal at Montreal last night, fell in and was drowned.

Mr. Donald Chisholm, M.P., Vancouver, B.C., who has been seriously ill in Ottawa for some months, is slowly recovering.

A gunner named Herbert Skinner, of the marine artillery, has had a windfall of £530,000 and a large property in Hereford.

The argument on the motion in reply to the exception to form in the Jesuit-Mail case was heard on Saturday before Judge Loranger in Montreal. Judgment was reserved.

Rev. S. G. Bland appeared in the pulpit of Queen Street Church, Kingston, yesterday, the first time since the serious accident which befel him occurred. His usefulness promises to be in no way impaired.

Six Chinamen passed through Montreal on Friday night from New York in bond for China, they having during eight years' residence saved sufficient money at laundry work to enable them to spend the rest of their days in comfort in their native land.

Mrs. Felicite Laframboise, 84 years of age, attended the 5 o'clock service on Saturday morning at Bonsecours Church, Montreal, and a few minutes later was discovered lying on the seat of her pew quite dead. Every effort was made to restore animation, but without success.

Patrick Ford, aged 60, a watchman in Armour's packing-houses, Chicago, shot and killed his wife, 23 years of age, on Saturday morning, and then put a bullet into his own breast. He cannot recover. The couple had been married three months, but quarrelled and were not living together.

A number of Conservative members of the British House of Commons, under the leadership of Mr. Henry Chaplin, have endeavored to impress upon the mind of Mr. Goschen the extent of the hardship imposed upon the landed classes by the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to increase the death tax of properties valued at over £10,000, and Mr. Goschen listened to their arguments, but declined to modify his proposals.

A largely-attended meeting was held at Anderton's Hotel, London, on Saturday afternoon for the purpose of discussing the feasibility of founding an Elsmerian Church, which shall be free from dogma and bend its energies to finding the millennium on earth, leaving the next world to take care of itself. It was proposed to name the new institution the Christian Ethical Church, and it was also decided to erect a building for purposes of worship in London.

The London police made a raid on the Field Club at 2 o'clock yesterday morning and found gambling going on. Most of the players were engaged at baccarat, and large sums were being staked. Twenty-one persons were arrested, among whom were three English and several French and Belgian noblemen. The prisoners were taken to the police station and bailed in £100 each. They are to appear in court to-morrow. The police seized £5,000 in the rooms of the club. A raid was also made on the Adelphi Club, where a number of barristers and solicitors were gambling. All were taken to the police station and bail was in most cases refused. Among those arrested at the Field Club were the Earl of Dudley, Lord Lurgan, Lord Paulet and Baron Feraro.

MARY ANN IMITATES DIDO.

Cremated Herself on a Brush Heap for Love of a Young Man.

A Cheboygan, Mich., despatch says: Mary Ann Collagher, aged 23, went into the woods on her father's farm, lighted a pile of brush, lay down in the flames, and was burned to a crisp. The reason assigned for the deed is that her parents objected to her receiving the attentions of a young man whom they disliked.

Important to Teachers and Scholars.

The High School entrance examination will be held on the 4th, 5th and 6th days of July, beginning at 1.30 p. m. on the 4th.

The third, second and first-class teachers' examinations will begin on Tuesday, the 9th of July. Applications stating age and optional subjects and enclosing a fee of $5 must be sent to the inspector before the 24th of May.

The Provincial examination for Kindergarten assistants and directors will be held in the last two weeks in June. Examination in practical teaching will be held at Ottawa, Toronto and Hamilton, beginning respectively on the 13th, 17th and 24th days of June. The written examination will begin at Toronto on the 26th of June. Applications must be sent to the Secretary of the Education Department before the 1st of June.

Manager Harris has added Mr. McGucken, of the late Carl Rosa's Opera Company to his list of tenors for the London season of Italian opera.

OUR CITIZEN SOLDIERS.

Arrangements for the Holding of the Annual Camps.

A special telegram from Ottawa says: The dates for the several camps of exercise have been decided as follows:

District No. 1	18th June.
" 2	11th June.
" 3	18th June.
" 4	18th June.
" 5	25th June.
" 6	25th June.
" 7	2nd July.
" 8	25th June.
" 9	3rd September.

The locations of the camps have not been decided upon, except with regard to District No. 2, which, as usual, will be held at Niagara. For District No. 1 the choice lies between Windsor and London, and for the united camps of districts 3 and 4 it is expected that Kingston will be selected. The matter will not, however, be settled before next week. The maximum number of officers, non-commissioned officers and men to receive pay for drill in each district will be:

District	No. 1—Western Ontario	2,420
"	No. 2—Toronto district	3,442
"	No. 3—Eastern Ontario	1,558
"	No. 4—Eastern Ontario	1,135
"	No. 5—Quebec	2,712
"	No. 6—Quebec	1,267
"	No. 7—Quebec	2,147
"	No. 8—New Brunswick	1,304
"	No. 9—Nova Scotia	1,932
"	No. 10—Manitoba	431
"	No. 11—British Columbia	230
"	No. 12—Prince Edward Island	327
Total		19,225

"A" Company, Infantry School Corps, will join the camp in New Brunswick; "B" Company, the camp in District No. 5; and "C" Company, the camp at Niagara, and a two-gun detachment from "A" Battery will join the camp in districts 3 and 4. As these are paid as permanent corps, they will be in addition to the strength authorized for districts 2, 3, 4, 5 and 8, but will not be included for drill pay. The Newcastle Field Battery will drill in camp near its local headquarters.

THE MISSING DOCTOR.

He Turns Out to be a St. Catharines Man.

A St. Louis despatch to the New York World gives the following information as to the career in that city of Dr. Cronin, who disappeared so mysteriously in Chicago on Saturday night last: Dr. Patrick Henry Cronin came to St. Louis in 1869 from St. Catharines, Canada, when 27 years old. He was a tailor, but never worked at his trade here. He secured employment as a porter in a wholesale grocery, but having a good tenor voice got a position in the Second Baptist Church choir, and this enabled him to obtain the position of omnibus ticket collector for the Transfer Company. He held this position two years, and was then for four years local ticket agent for the St. Louis and Southeastern Railroad, now the Louisville Air Line. Next he opened a drug store in the fashionable west end, attended a pharmacy school and the Missouri Medical College, and afterwards practised medicine, making a specialty of throat and lung diseases. In 1880 he went to Europe as an honorary commissioner to the Paris Exposition, and soon afterwards removed to Chicago. For a time he was professor of eye and ear diseases at the St. Louis College of Physicians and Surgeons. He was a fine-looking man and a hard worker.

Dr. Cronin is a brother-in-law of Mr. John Carroll and an uncle of Mr. Andrew J. Carroll, of St. Catharines. His family resided on Welland avenue, next door to the fire station. At one time he worked for his father in the shoe store, in the premises now occupied by the "Beehive," and was quite a popular vocalist at that time.

TEN MEN KILLED.

Terrible Accident in a Pennsylvania Coal Mine.

A Pottsville, Pa., despatch says: At Kaska-William Colliery, near Middleport, this evening the cage containing ten miners was ascending the shaft and was 16 feet from the bottom when an empty car was pushed over the top of the shaft by two Hungarian laborers. The car struck the cage with awful momentum, shattering it to splinters and killing every one of its occupants. The victims are Michael Bohle, assistant inside foreman; Hugh Carlin, Patrick McDonald, George Rendal, John Pottovisch, Frank Strakovisch, John Moore, Albert Dwyer, Edward Kurtz and Stephen Watson. The cage was hurled into a hole at the bottom where the water from the workings accumulated. The mine is operated by the Alliance Coal Company. The shaft is 500 feet deep.

Her Husband's Image.

A singular case of mistaken identity occurred to-day, when Mrs. James Duke, of Beloit, Wis., arrived here in company with six interesting children, and claimed as her lost husband a cigarmaker named David Robinson, who is the foreman in the factory of Messrs. Robinson & Watson. The lady, who is well dressed and quite prepossessing, confronted her alleged husband this evening, and even after conversing with him was not satisfied that he was not her lost husband until she examined his wrist for a scar. Failing to find this she broke down and admitted that she was mistaken in the man. How much Robinson must have resembled Duke is attested by the fact that the children clung around him affectionately calling him papa. Mrs. Duke's husband, who was a cigarmaker, disappeared mysteriously about a year ago, and she was led to believe he was located here through information received from a travelling tobacco salesman.

The New Niagara Bridge.

Counsel for various American railroads have asked for a hearing on the Bill incorporating the Niagara River Bridge Company, now pending in the New York Legislature, and it has been appointed for next Tuesday. The object of the company is to build a bridge across Niagara River at some point between Niagara Falls and Lewiston, and, it is believed, in the interest of the Canadian Pacific. The project is to be opposed.

The late Dr. Dio Lewis, whose name is a household word all over the globe, warmly endorsed the use of Warner's Safe Cure in cases of kidney disorder. He said over his own signature: "If I found myself a victim of serious kidney trouble, I would use Warner's Safe Cure."

A DEMORALIZED MEDIUM.

Kicked Out of Doors With His Ghosts and Cabinet.

Dr. Francis Buckner was in court at Covington, O., last Monday to answer to a charge of assault on Dr. Warner, a spiritualist medium. Some weeks ago Warner took rooms at Buckner's, and before the latter knew what was going on had gained complete control over Mrs. Buckner and the children so far as spiritualism was concerned. Buckner ordered Warner to leave the house, but the wife interfered and he remained. Last Sunday evening Buckner came in from a professional visit and found Warner holding a seance in his parlor, assisted by two women from Chicago named Hughes and Shaw. Several neighbors were present and the disembodied were making frequent visits to the room. A white something, that claimed to be a dead sister of Mrs. Buckner, was sliding about. Before anybody realized what was going on Dr. Buckner had the something in his arms. It yelled, but it was useless, and Buckner dragging it to the hall door, threw it forcibly down the steps, when, after the wraps were removed, it proved to be Mrs. Shaw, with cut and bleeding face. Rushing back, Buckner caught Mrs. Hughes and threw her out of a window, and then gave his attention to Dr. Warner, first warning the people in the room not to interfere. Warner was knocked down and kicked, thrown against the wall and rolled under the piano. He was mauled on the head and pummeled on the body. His nose bled, blood came from his mouth, one eye was closed, and his clothing was remarkable for the variety of rents it displayed. Finally Buckner stood the medium up and kicked him out of doors down the walk into the street.

Returning to the house, Buckner smashed the cabinet and tossed Warner's personal effects into the street, where a great crowd had gathered and cheered the doctor as he made spiritualism a wreck in the Buckner household. The two ejected women had returned to the house, but Buckner drove them out, throwing their effects after them. Warner had Buckner arrested for assault and battery and malicious destruction of property. Warner presented a doleful appearance. One eye was closed, an arm in a sling and his face disfigured. The two women, who appeared as witnesses, looked little better. After hearing Buckner's story the Judge dismissed him, and told Warner he thought he got off easily.

WOMEN IN TROUSERS.

Recent Cases That Have Been Exciting Considerable Interest Abroad.

An unusually large number of cases of women passing for men have recently been discovered in Great Britain and France. The most remarkable for length of time during which the deception was maintained was that of a person who, during a voyage from France to the Island of Jersey, acted in a strange manner and finally fell unconscious. A doctor found that although dressed as a man it was really a woman. After being sent to a hospital in Jersey she told her story, which was that at the age of 13 she had been left an orphan and had then adopted male clothes, which she had ever since worn without discovery. She was 55 years old and had therefore worn trousers for forty-two years. She had for the greater part of her life pursued the calling of a courier, guiding parties of travellers over all parts of Europe, under the name of Louis Herman Tobush. She had done well at the business and had a balance at her banker's. When she was taken sick on the steamer she wore a fur waistcoat, a long overcoat, a stiff hat, and a turned down collar, and smoked a long pipe or a strong cigar, as she chanced to please. No one had any suspicion she was not a man. Among the witnesses in a recent suit at the Palace of Justice in Paris was a person, apparently a young man, dressed like a student, who was accompanied by what seemed to be an elderly gentleman of grave aspect. When the name of M'me Libert was called the young man stepped forward. "I beg your pardon," said the clerk. "I am asking for a lady, and not a man." "But this young man is my daughter," exclaimed the sedate gentleman, stepping forward. The clerk decided to let the judge see the witness and settle the matter. The judge told the young woman to go home and put on proper clothes before she appeared to testify. "But I have not a single dress to my name," she exclaimed. It turned out the old M'me Libert runs a printing office and had for a long time worn male clothing in order to manage her business better. She was bringing up her daughter to the same custom.—New York Sun.

Joe Beef's Epitaph.

Some time since the famous "Joe Beef" died at his residence on Common street, Montreal, and was duly mourned by his wife and children. One of Mrs. McKiernan's first acts after "Joe" had ceased to live was to compose something appropriate for the stone which was to mark the last resting place of the deceased. Messrs. Forsyth & Co. have furnished the tombstone and Mrs. McKiernan the poetry. Here it is, with the inscription:

In Memoriam.
CHARLES McKIERNAN,
Better known as "Joe Beef,"
Born at Cavan, Ireland,
December 4, 1835,
Died at Montreal
January 15, 1889.

Such was the departed one we mourn,
Dear to us all, cherished be his name;
Eternal pleasure reigns where he is gone—
Our loss is great, but oh! how great his gain.

Full many a man of wealth and power
Has died and gone before,
Who scorned to give a poor man bread
When he stood at his door.

But Joe took in the great unwashed,
Who shared his humble style;
He made their life a merry one,
Without a thought of guile.

Their eyes are dim for loss of him,
Their grief is quite sincere;
He housed them from the winter blast,
And filled them with good cheer.

And when the day of reckoning comes—
As come it does to all—
Such sincere mourners they'll not have
Behind their funeral pall.

FRED'S PUNISHMENT.

Rather Hard to Decide On, but It Would be Pretty Severe.

They were talking of somebody who had been shamelessly jilted by her young man. A woman is never as hard on a young man for jilting a girl as on a girl for jilting a young man.

"Fred, if you did that to me, if you went off with another girl, do you know what I would do?"

"No, dear. What?"

"I would simply get hold of you and tell you what I thought of you, and then I'd leave you and never speak to you again."

"Would you really do that?"

"Yes, I—no, I don't think I would. I would despise you and have too great a contempt for you to take any notice of it at all or of you ever after. If you think so little of me after all you said you cannot be the gentleman I thought you were."

"But, I say, dear, I haven't, you know; I haven't done anything at all.

"No, I know you haven't, but if you were to, if I found that you were making love to another girl—I d—no—I wouldn't—I'd just be as nice as I could be to you—doublynice to you—and I'd make youso fond of me you couldn't live without me, and then I'd turn around and tell you I wanted nothing more to do with you."

"That would be mean."

"Well, so it would. No, I guess I'd go to you and tell you quietly that although you were so contemptibly double-faced it couldn't be. I have too much self-respect; and that you were free—free to go with anybody you liked."

"That would be better."

"Would it? Oh, that wouldn't be all. I'd make you suffer—Oh, I'd make you suffer if you ever treated me like that."

"What would you do?"

"I'd wait till I got a good opportunity and I'd humiliate you."

"How?"

"I don't know, but I would do it all the same. Maybe you think I'm stupid; but I'd show you."

"Shall I tell you what you'd do if you ever found me out——"

"Do you mean to say you have already? Well——"

"No. If I ever did, do you know what you'd do?"

"What?"

"You'd go out and get another young man and make it out you jilted me."

"Well, I guess that's what I really would do, after all."

Comparisons of Religions.

When returning to Buda-Pesth, Mohammed Naim, an Afghan dervish, called upon me. He related to me the details of his extraordinary adventures, and the impression produced upon him through his dumb intercourse with the people is highly interesting. Judging men and things from an Afghan point of view, he was at a loss to find an explanation for the kindheartedness shown to him by a nation so utterly different in religion, morals and habits. He very naturally arrived at the conclusion that his own countrymen, agitated by an incomprehensible mode of thinking, are rude, cruel, and certainly inferior to the Christians among whom he wandered. "My Afghan brethren," he said, "by caring too much for the salvation of men belonging to another creed, are certainly acting against the rules of hospitality and humanity, while the Christians, by caring little or nothing for religious differences, really fulfil toward their fellow-creatures all the duties of humanity and of social intercourse." This he gladly admitted; but, on the other hand, he stanchly adhered to the superiority of his Mahommedan religion, and curious were the motives with which he tried to justify his opinion. "The Jews," he said, "accept and follow Moses as their prophet; the Christians, by accepting Moses and Jesus, have got two leaders, and are in advance of the Jews; while we Mohammedans, by accepting Moses, Jesus and Mohammed, have got three leaders, and are therefore ahead of all as regards spiritual guidance, for a people led by three leaders is certainly less exposed to lose its way or to stumble on the path which leads to truth." In the course of his further conversation he nevertheless felt himself obliged to confess that the Christian world is in the ascendency over the Moslem world, and that sooner or later all Islam will be subdued by the overwhelming power of the active, strong and just men of Europe. The downfall of the Mohammedans he finds inevitable, but he ascribes it rather to the sinful negligence and religious laxity of his fellow-believers than to the higher level of the Christian religion.—Arminius Vambery in Good Words.

Hit by a Coincidence.

The owner of a place on Second avenue stood in his barn door on the alley the other day when a man with a wooden leg and a crutch came along and passed the time o' day and finally said:

"Say, I want you to do me a favor. I want to leave my leg with you for a few minutes."

"Why?"

"I want to go around on second avenue and work a house for half a dollar in money. I've got a pointer that the folks are very sympathetic. If I go with one leg I'm sure of it."

"Very well; just leave your leg here and I'll take care of it."

The wooden substitute was unstrapped and handed over, and the cripple used the crutch to help himself down the alley. Five minutes later he rang the doorbell of a house around the avenue, to have it opened by the man he had seen at the barn.

"W—wha—what!" he gasped in astonishment.

"Very sympathetic family lives here!" quietly replied the other. "You seem to have met with a sad loss, and I'm anxious to help you. Here is a wooden leg which may fit you."

The leg was handed over, the man sat down on the steps and strapped it on, and, as he got up and stumped through the gate, he said to himself:

"I've heard of coincidences ever since I was knee-high to hop-toad, but this is the first one that ever hit me with both feet to once!"—Detroit Free Press.

AN UNPRECEDENTED RACE.

It Lasted 108 Days and Was Won by Only Ten Minutes.

Two old sea dogs were celebrating New Year's Day in a comfortable little grog-shop in the Plaza Mayor, the principal square in Manila. One of them, Capt. Stuart, a Scotchman, was commander of the John McLeod; the other, Capt. Sewell, an American, commanded the Paul Revere. Both vessels were full-rigged ships, nearly the same size, and both were noted for their sailing qualities. The two captains were proud of their ships, and each claimed that his was the best. The controversy, at first friendly, became heated. Finally Capt. Sewell brought his fist down on the table and shouted: "I'll race you to New York for anything you want to bet. We can sail from here the same day and we are both bound for the same port. What do you say?"

"Done," said the Scotchman.

"Let it be for the best dinner money can buy."

Two days later both vessels had their cargoes aboard, weighed anchor and set sail for this country. For a long time they could see each other through their glasses, but when they reached Cape Horn they were driven far apart. Their destination was never forgotten, and all the canvas their ships could carry was crowded on. The horizon was constantly scanned for a sight of the rival ship, but for more than a month without success.

At length, when southeast of Hatteras, they sighted each other. They were almost abreast and about fifteen miles apart. In this position they continued until nightfall. After dark a furious gale came up, driving them several miles out of their course. Sail was shortened as little as was consistent with safety, however. For four days the gale continued, during which time neither ship could gain an advantage. At last the weather moderated, but the vessels had lost sight of each other. No time was lost, and both made for the winning post, then only a few hundred miles away. Down the homeward stretch they came, until when day broke yesterday morning they were in sight of Sandy Hook. When Capt. Sewell got out his glasses and leveled them to windward, he yelled: "By Jehosaphat, there's the McLeod, and we're not a foot ahead of her."

This was the literal truth. The two vessels were "neck and neck" after a race of 108 days. Capt. Stuart saw the Revere about the same time and both ships crowded on every inch of canvas they could carry. Over the bar they came, up through the lower bay, neither having the slightest advantage. Just before they reached the Narrows the Revere got a slant of wind which the McLeod missed. It was not much, but it carried her ahead and she dropped anchor at quarantine at 7.10 a.m. The yell which went up from the throats of her crew awoke all hands on shore, who came out just in time to see the McLeod let go her anchor ten minutes later. Thus was won and lost the longest and closest race on record.—New York Correspondent Chicago Journal.

Bits of Wampum.

A Big Fence.

Arrangements have been about completed by the Walrond ranch to fence in a large portion of their range. The fence will begin at the Old Man's River, this side of the Piegan reserve, and will extend to the hills some twelve or fourteen miles, gates being left at regular intervals. We believe the contracts for getting out posts, etc., have already been let.—Macleod Gazette.

HEADACHE, fickle appetite, failure of eyesight, tube casts in urine, frequent desire to urinate, especially at night, cramps in calf of legs, gradual loss of flesh and dropsical swelling—any one or more of the above disorders are symptoms of advanced kidney disease or Bright's disease, and Warner's Safe Cure should be freely used according to directions. Dr. Wm. H. Thompson, of the city of New York, says: "More adults are carried off in this country by chronic kidney disease than by any other one malady except consumption. The late Dr. Dio Lewis says, over his own signature, in speaking of Warner's Safe Cure: "If I found myself the victim of a serious kidney trouble I should use your preparation."

A POINTER.

As every reader of this paper knows, it has become one of the fine arts to write attractive and interesting advertisements—especially medical ones.

Now it seems to us that if, for instance, the world-wide advertisers of Warner's Safe Remedies would adopt a style whereby they could work in a startling story of, say—wolves, we believe the immense sales of their medicines could be still more largely increased. We give them the benefit of the idea at any event. Let it commence like this:

Patter! Patter! Patter!

There it is again. It is not fifty yards from where he last halted. The steps are too light for those of an Indian. A grizzly would rush upon its victim with a roar of defiance and anger. A panther would hurl himself through thirty feet of space, with a scream to unnerve the hardiest hunter. "Wolves," whispers the hunter, as a howl suddenly bursts upon his ear.

Wolves! the gaunt grizzly wolves of the foot-hills—thin and poor and hungry and savage—the legs tireless—the mouth full of teeth which can crack the shoulder-bone of a buffalo. He can see their dark forms flitting from point to point—the patter of their feet upon the parched grass proves that he is surrounded—yet no more in danger, and no more effectually surrounded than he who trifles with the symptoms of kidney disease. And you, reader, know whether or not you are a victim to its insidious encroachment. If your back aches, if your eyesight is failing, if your appetite is fickle, if your urine is not clear and of a pale straw color, do not hesitate on the prairie of danger, but flee to the nearest haven of safety, and resort to the only known cure for kidney and liver troubles, Warner's Safe Cure. It is a duty you owe, not only to yourself but to your family and society at large.

Delays are dangerous.

Had the traveller not been overtaken in the night, and unarmed, the wolves would have had no terrors for him. We warn you just now, in broad daylight, before the wolves of disease sink their poisoned fangs deeply into your flesh and the night of death settles down upon you, to stop your ears to prejudice and bigotry, and to fly to safety through the means we have pointed out

Chamberlain's Great Blow Out.

Edmund Yates says: Chamberlain's party at Highbury made one rub one's eyes and wonder whether he were awake or only passing through a dream. Dukes, Marquises, Earls, Viscounts, all came to pour incense on the altar of Unionism in the temple of which Chamberlain is the high priest. How the wheel goes round! For it seems but yesterday, under other auspices and with Schnadhorst as guardian angel, that another Gospel was preached and another altar lighted at the shrine—but no one wishes to be critical. The Highbury party was Unionist, intellectual, smart, amusing, cosmopolitan. Mrs. Chamberlain made the most charming of hostesses, and won every heart not already captivated. Her reception was very crowded. She pleased her Birmingham lieges by appearing in their pearl necklace. Every one who came feasted his eyes on a larger collection of the British aristocracy than they had ever seen or were likely to see again. The house at Highbury, most comfortable and luxuriously furnished, was done up recently, and what few improvements were wanted were added when Mr. Chamberlain brought home his bride.

How to Manage a Kicker.

Says a writer: "I have seen gentle cows spoiled by pounding, but I never saw a kicker cured by it. If any horned animal kicks you, try to make it think you like to be kicked. Kind treatment and the entire ignoring of a kick from a cow will generally cure. Animals kick because they are afraid of you and can't get out of your way. Convince them that you won't hurt them under any circumstances and the cause for kicking is removed. For an unsafe or nervous cow, however, I use a rope; about three-eighths rope is best. Tie a good snap to one end and a ring to the other, and have it about two or two and a half feet long over all. Pass the rope around the left hind leg just above the gambrel joint, give it one twist between the legs and then snap the ends together outside the right leg, and your cow is harmless. The more she is inclined to kick, the tighter the rope may be twisted. Now keep this rope hanging just behind the kicker and you need never whip her."

Gulls Always in Season.

A few days ago a young man in an eastern city sent 25 cents to the United States for an article that was advertised as a sure destroyer of potato bugs. The parcel arrived on Saturday and contained two small blocks of wood, with directions for use; the purchaser being informed not to open it until necessary. The innocent youth was given these directions: "When the insect is captured place it between the two blocks, squeeze down on them, and you will find that it is sure death to all kinds of bugs." Another gentleman sent 25 cents to Boston for a steel engraving of Queen Victoria and a 1 cent Canadian stamp was sent to him.

Settling the Argument.

Marietta—Husband, you are alway complaining about the ostentation of th diamonds I wear in my hair. Have you forgotten that Shakspeare wrote, "E'en the venomous toad hath a jewel in his head?"

Husband—Oh, well, if you want to dress like a toad, I have nothing more to say.

Needed Relief.

"Could I induce you, Mr. Jobson, to part with your seraphic daughter Clara?"

"Bless your life, young man, yes! I told her mother last night that if nobody came along pretty soon I'd let her run off with the coachman."

The rumor is out that Digby Bell will go starring next season.

Mrs. T. Charles Watson, the well-known elocutionist and actress, is dangerously ill in New York.

Bagley—I want a little advice. My friends tell me to adopt literature as a means of a livelihood. What is the most necessary thing to do first? Editor—Get somebody to give you a good big bank account.

DR. CRONIN SPOKEN.

A Recent Mysterious Disappearance with a Queer Sequel.

Dr. H. P. Cronin, of Chicago, the former St. Catharines resident, whose mysterious disappearance has caused such a sensation in Chicago, was seen in Toronto yesterday. He took the 12.20 G. T. R. train for this city. The reason for the man's strange conduct is not given. He was seen on Yonge street, Toronto, by a person whose family physician he was in Chicago. When accosted with "Why, hello, Doc, how are you? What are you doinghere?" he replied, "My dear sir, you have the advantage of me. I don't know you."

"Now look here, Doc, there's no use of talking like that. Why do you speak that way to me?"

"My dear sir," replied the doctor," if you don't cease molesting me I'll call a policeman and have you arrested."

Then Dr. Cronin drew himself up and moved off. He looked half crazy, says the man who spoke to him.

The Millionaire's Secret.

"The secret of success," said the prince of American millionaires, "is very simple. Keep out of debt, keep your head cool and your bowels open." Thus in twelve words of wisdom was summed up the policy which turned a poor boy into a hundred-millionaire. Success often hinges upon as small a matter as the state of the bowels. So you see that Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets are not only the royal road to health, but to wealth and happiness as well.

How to Tell a True Flasher from a False.

"It doesn't require an expert," said Dr. De Manil, "to tell whether a diamond is genuine or not. The test is very simple and can be made in any place and in a moment. All you need is a piece of paper and a lead pencil. With the latter make a small dot on the paper, then look at it through the diamond. If you can see but one dot you can depend upon it that the stone is genuine, but if the mark is scattered, or shows more than one, you will be perfectly safe in refusing to pay ten cents for a stone that may be offered you at $500."—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Doomed to die, and oh, so young,
Is there nothing that can save
This poor, hopeless sufferer
From the dark and cruel grave?
Comes an answer, "Yes, there is.
"Favorite Prescription" try
It has saved the lives of thousands
Who were given up to die."

For all "female diseases" Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the standard remedy, and no woman should despair of recovery until she has given it a trial.

Time Brings Wisdom.

Rev. Dr. Prim—"Do you preach extempore, Brother Yallerby, or do you take notes?

Brother Yallerby (from the South)—Well, sah, dar was once a time I took notes, but I'be found it safest, down in my deestrick, to insist on habin' the cash down! Texas Siftings.

When you feel your strength is failing,
In some strange, mysterious way
When your cheek is slowly paling
And, "Poor thing," the neighbors say,
As they look at you in pity,
To the nearest drug store send,
At the earliest chance and get a
Bottle of the Sick Man's Friend.

You will get what you want by asking for Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. This medicine tones up and invigorates the weakened system by purifying the blood and restoring lost vigor.

Encouraging.

"Well, how did you enjoy yourself in the Art Exhibition?" "Oh, splendidly! I looked at nobody's pictures but yours! You see there were always so many people standing before the other pictures, and there was always plenty of room by yours!"—Fliegende Blatter.

Sat Upon.

The Montreal Star says: It is announced on excellent authority that the recent Papal decree constituting an independent university in Montreal has been quashed at the instance of His Eminence the Cardinal Archbishop of Quebec.

The Shoe & Leather Reporter, N. Y., and Shoe & Leather Review, Chicago, the leading trade papers of the U.S. in the Hide line, have sent their representatives to investigate Mr. Page's business, and after a thorough examination and comparison the Reporter gives him this endorsement

"We believe that in extent of light-weight raw material collected and carried, Mr Page holds the lead of any competitor and that his present stock is the largest held by any house in this country."

And the Review says:

"After a most thorough investigation of Mr Page's business as compared with others in same line, we have become fully satisfied that in its specialty, light-weight stock, he is unquestionably the largest dealer in this country, while in superiority of quality he is confessedly at the head."

QUERY: If Mr. Page's business is the largest in its line in the United States, is it not the best possible proof of his ability to pay highest prices? If he did not do so, would he naturally get more Skins than any of his competitors in the same line?

Milk for Cheese Factories.

BY JAS. W. ROBERTSON, PROFESSOR OF DAIRYING

FEED.—The milk of cows being a direct elaboration from their blood, whatever interferes with the healthy condition of that fluid will also affect the quality and quantity of the milk secreted. Too much care cannot be exercised in providing feed suitable, succulent, easily digestible, wholesome and nutritious. The grass of early summer is too watery and weak in nutriment for its bulk, to be fed alone to the greatest advantage. A judicious allowance of bran, peas and oats, oil cake or cotton seed meal will increase the milk supply and fortify the cows system for the larger production of milk during mid summer, fall and winter. Fodder corn, cows broadcast, does not meet the needs of milking cows. Such a feed [illegible] for though a cow turned to feed like cows into fodder corn, knowing that they have been fed when they have been only fed up. The same plant when grown with a determination favorable to its attainment of mature size and quality, in rows or hills 3 feet apart with from 2 to 6 seeds per foot in the rows, yields a fodder by means of which cows are enabled to produce the largest amount of milk, butter or cheese per acre of the land required for their support. Fodder corn is not a complete ration for the most economical production of the best milk. When supplemented by feed rich in albuminoids, such as those already mentioned, better returns for the feed consumed are realised. Last summer one of our leading Canadian dairymen, feeding 18 cows upon fodder corn to supplement scant pasture, furnished milk to a cheese factory. In course of time he provided a supply of bran, and by the end of the first week thereafter he found by an examination of the factory books that he was credited with enough extra milk to pay for the bran consumed (2½ lb per cow per day), and to leave him a balance of $2.43 of extra profit for that week.

WATER.—Water is nature's vehicle for carrying about most of the matter which she requires to move from place to place. The great builders were quietly clasped in her arms and without apparent effort brought from the northern ridges to the southern parts of our province. The tiniest specks of nourishing matter needed to replace the worn out tissues of the body are likewise carried to their proper places in this wonderful circulation. The identical water swallowed by a cow to serve as a carrying medium in her blood for the equable distribution of the elements of nutrition throughout her whole body is made to serve a like office in the milk which she yields. If that water be pure in the first place, it is liable to contamination throughout its whole transition from the drinking by the cow until after its consumption by the creature constituting the cow's product. Water which has been contaminated by decaying animal matter is specially likely to retain its impurities. The milk from cows drinking such water is a menace and danger to the public health, and interferes greatly with the commercial value of all dairy products. There should be an abundant supply of pure water, easily accessible by the cows during hot weather. It should be furnished at a comfortable temperature during the cold weather of winter. I have not found that cows which are denied access to abundance of water will give as much milk or milk of as good quality as when plenty of water is provided with wholesome satisfying food.

SALT.—Dairy cattle should have access to salt every day, and salt should be added to all their stable feed daily. A series of experiments has convinced me that when cows are denied salt for a period of even one week they will yield from 14½ 17½ per cent. less milk, and that of an inferior quality. Such milk will on the average turn sour in 36 hours less time than milk drawn from the same or similar cows receiving salt, all other treatment being equal.

SHELTER.—Comfortable quarters are indispensible to the health and well-being of cows. Stables during the winter should have a temperature constantly within the range of from 40° to 55° Fahr. In summer time a shade should be provided in the pasture fields, or adjacent thereto, to protect against the bristle making influence of July and August suns.

In all the management of cows such conditions should be provided and such care given as will insure excellent health and apparent contentment.

MILKING.—When practicable, milking should be done by the same person, and with regularity as to time. He only that hath clean hands should be allowed to milk a cow. I say "he" because I think the men of the farm should do all the milking, at least during the winter months. I have exercised the right of changing my mind on that subject since I left the farm. It is no more difficult to milk with dry hands than with them wet. It is certainly more cleanly, and leaves the milk in a much more desirable condition for table use or manufacture. Pure stable atmosphere is indispensible to prevent contamination from that source. Immediate straining will remove impurities which otherwise might be dissolved to the permanent injury to the whole product.

AERATION.—After the straining is attended to, the milk should be aerated. Too often it is poured into an enlarge can and left there just as the cows have given it. That neglect implies three things that are very injurious to its quality for cheese-making. (1) The peculiar odor which the cow imparts to the milk will be left in it until it becomes fixed in its flavor. (2) The germs of fermentation that come in the milk and from the air have the best conditions for growth and action when the milk is left undisturbed. (3) Then the milk will become almost unfit for thorough coagulation by rennet. Hence it is needful and advantageous to aerate it for three reasons. 1st, because by pouring stirring, dipping or by trickling it over an exposed surface there is eliminated from the milk by evaporation any objectionable volatile element that may be in it. Secondly, because as has already been stated the milk contains germs of fermentation. Some of these are called vibriones. A strange peculiarity about these microbes is that they become active only in the absence of free oxygen. When warm new milk is left undisturbed carbonic gas is generated, and that furnishes the best condition for the commencement of action by these almost invisible creatures. After they get started they can keep up their decomposing work even in the presence of oxygen. It is impossible to coagulate such milk as to yield a fine quality of keeping cheese. Coagulation by rennet of milk that is ripe can never be perfect unless it has been thoroughly aerated immediately after it is taken from the cow. Neglect of aeration will increase the quantity of milk required to make a pound of fine cheese, thirdly, because the airing seems to give vigor to the germs of fermentation that bring about an acid condition of the milk, without producing the acid. So much is this so that it has been found impracticable to make strictly first-class Cheddar cheese from milk that has not been aerated.

ALSO A BARON MUNCHAUSEN.

The Dunkalk Herald must feel he has not as yet quite made his good, and desires to prolong the controversy on railway monopoly in the last issue, under the guise of summing up, he brings in matters which are entirely irrelevant to the question, and makes assertions the falsity of which could only be equalled by a Baron Munchausen. His first falsehood is the assertion that we were advised to "pitch into the Herald." The little rooster of the Herald would be wise in refraining from plumeing his feathers with the idea that any notice was taken of his articles by those most interested. We never even heard the matter mentioned until after our first article appeared. It was an unfortunate day for this little man's vanity when The Advance drew the public's attention to his pomposity. Mr. Hall says we have not proven the falsity of information given to him. Three individuals gave him figures: two of them tallied, but the third was 2½ cents below, and correct. He based his statistics on the higher figures. The public must be a better judge than you, Mr. Hall, as to whether all three could be correct. We ignored none of your statements, and misquoted none of your sentences. We published all your most important "points," that the public might judge of them, and that is what you have not dared do with ours. We accused you of witholding the fact that the tariff on certain articles was lowered correspondingly with the raising of others, and you have not denied it. Why? We accuse you now of being actuated throughout this whole matter with a personal animus towards the railway company, and an insane desire to "get even." You understand what we mean. You also accused us of being influenced by political exigences. We asked you time and again to inform the people what politics had to do with the question, but such information was not forthcoming. The silly assertion was laughed at, like a good many more of a similar kind which appeared in the Herald.

The Advance an "unprincipled assailant," indeed! When viewed side by side with the principles promulgated by the immaculate Theophilus, The Advance can await judgement with no misgiving heart.

The Herald also accuses us of attempting to pick a quarrel with the Markdale Standard. That is also one of Mr. Hall's exaggerations. We do not desire to quarrel with an honorable Lan, which, we are happy to say, we have always found Mr. Rutledge to be, and in this respect we cannot help but favorably compare that gentleman with the individual who runs the [illegible] business in Dundalk. There is a wide difference in the meaning of the words "discussion" and "quarrel" which your little brain cannot discern, Mr. Hall.

As a wind up to all previous efforts in the line of falsifying, the Dundalk Herald says "He Mr. Thurston did his level best to buy the Herald, and couldn't get it. Then the present proprietor came along and bought it. You see now why he vents his venom at the Herald. This, from an ex minister, almost takes our breath away. We designate it a lie manufactured out of whole cloth. We did at one time think of buying the paper, but it was long before Mr. Hall's last advent upon the platform of journalism. He knows this, but deliberately makes a false statement, and [illegible] We would remind readers that the Herald remarks more than the Advance part that the Herald was offered at, they will understand about how much we would like to get it.

We feel that we owe an apology to our readers for answering these personal sims and falsehoods, and hope will tender the same. Our controversy with Mr. Hall has convinced us that a man with the same professions which he has made, and who will deliberately falsify, as he has done, is an extremely unworthy opponent for any newspaper man to match swords with. We are not well versed in such dishonorable tactics, and will therefore leave that field to Mr. Hall, with the observation that his remarkable career has added another golden maxim to the long list, quite worthy of a place beside the brightest gems of King Solomon's Proverbs: "A poor preacher is rather to be chosen than a silly journalist." Our criticism has only had the effect of exemplifying the old Latin proverb, "meritis odium parit" that often causes hatred.

Uncle Sam's department at the Paris Exhibition is religiously closed on Sundays. It will be well worthy a journey to Paris just to see the expression on the face of the Chicagoan who visits the exhibition on Sunday to find his countrymen so much more virtuous abroad than they are at home.—Empire.

On June 4, 11 and 18 the C.P.R. will run cheap excursions to points in Manitoba and the Northwest at the following figures: Calgarry and return, $35; Deloraine, Glenboro, Saltcoats and Moosomin, and return, $28. This terrible railway monopoly will soon crush the farmers with its fearfully high passenger rates, will it not Mr. Hall? Just think of a trip of four thousand six hundred miles for $35. Outrageous! From statistics we learn that the average rate for passenger traffic over the C. P. R. system for the year 1888 was 1.79 cents per mile.

By enactment of the Council of Artemesia at its last session it has been made an object with farmers to plant trees along highways in front of their lots, and along the lines between lots. Twenty-five cents for each such tree living at the end of three years is the sum which the Council guarantees to provide. Trees planted along highways shall be 25 feet apart, and not nearer than 6 feet from bound[illegible] along lines between lots, 30 feet. An inspector is provided to see that [illegible] are carried out. A [illegible] of Mr. Jas. Brodie, whose [illegible] was to examine the trees and certify to the fact that such [illegible] were planted and are growing. [illegible] to be hoped that the bylaw will [illegible] the desired effect of stimulating [illegible] planting of shade trees along [illegible] highways and around our farms. A [illegible] of the farmer will more [illegible] the beauty and value of [illegible] farm than the planting of rows of shade trees around his farm; and now that a beginning has been placed [illegible] much decorations, no doubt the [illegible] of this will be productive of good in this township.

CAUGHT BY A TOY TRUNK.

Notorious "Collection Agency" Swindler Behind the Bars at Last.

HOW HE DID UP ST. CATHARINES.

Mr. John A. Ward, of Buffalo, bought a toy trunk for 50 cents at a recent sale of unclaimed packages by the American Express Company, and on opening it found that it contained indorsed notes aggregating in value $800 and also a bundle of old letters. The romance was in the old letters, for they told of the love adventures of C. W. McAllister, formerly of St. Catharines, his runaway marriage at Reading, Pa., with Ida Milley, a girl he had met but twenty-four hours before, his sharp financial practices, his flight from justice, his wanderings about while his faithful wife, true to her husband in spite of all, sent him under his many aliases words of cheer and love, and kept him posted on the movements of the police. Finally, as shown by the letters, she was to join him. She packed up valuable papers in a child's trunk, including the $800 worth of notes that subsequently came into Mr. Ward's possession and also the pictures of herself, husband and baby. The trunk was addressed "Mrs. C. W. Merrills, Corning, hotel opposite depot." From its contents the trunk was undeniably the property of Mrs. C. W. McAllister, and whether it was misdirected to throw the police off the scent, or whether a stranger had directed it at the request of the owner is not known. If it was the intention to throw the police off the scent the scheme failed, for C. W. McAllister has been arrested, and all through that little trunk falling into Mr. Ward's hands. The letters showed that Mrs. McAllister came of a good family near Lebanon, Pa. Some threads in the story that could not be found in the letters are now revealed by letters since received by Mrs. Ward, and also tell of McAllister's subsequent doings. A few days after the story was printed Mr. Ward received the following from Louis H. Myers, a detective of Cairo, Ill.:

I saw in Sunday's Globe an account of C. W. McAllister's trunk being sold by an express company and some letters being found from his wife. The gentleman, Mr. C. W. McAllister, is a travelling swindler. He did up the people in Memphis last August. From there he went to Toledo coming then to Cairo, Ill. Here he worked under the name of C. W. Miller, Principal of the Home Law Protection and Collection Agency of the United States and Canada. The lady with him is of fine family and her mother lives at Mt. Nebo, within ten miles of Lebanon, Pa. She has an uncle living in Lebanon, Pa. Her mother's name, I think, is Mrs. Mully. He did up Lebanon county in the same way, took the young lady without the consent of her parents stole her. I want McAllister alias Miller, and I will give $50 reward to locate him. They both joined the Methodist Church here, and bought coal and turkeys for the preacher, all on credit, but left without paying for them.

Last week Mr. Ward received a postal card from Detective Myers, of Cairo, Ill., posted at Buffalo while the detective was taking a flying trip from west to east. It explains itself:

Passed through your city to-day en route for Boston, Mass., where I had C. W. McAllister arrested, and will return him to Cairo, Ill. He has been doing business in New York city, Camden, N. J., and rounded up at Boston.

By this time the slick swindler is undoubtedly languishing in an Illinois jail and Mrs. McAllister is with her friends in Pennsylvania. So ends the romance of the toy trunk. McAllister carried on his collection agency business in St. Catharines a little over a year ago and left the town suddenly, leaving a number of creditors and patrons in the lurch.

Betrayed by a Cigar Stub.

A Pittsburg despatch says: H. J. Cook, formerly of Allegheny City, who was arrested in London, Ont., yesterday, for robbing the Potersville Savings Bank in Mercer county, this State, of $2,000 two weeks ago, was formerly employed in the bank building. He was an inveterate smoker, and had the habit of chewing the end of his cigar. The morning after the robbery a stump of a cigar was found on the floor of the bank, and it gave evidence of having been in Cook's mouth from the peculiarity mentioned. He was arrested yesterday and made a confession implicating others.

A BLOODY SCHOOL ELECTION.

Prominent Citizens Shot Down and Murdered—A Coroner Invited to Leave Town.

A last (Saturday) night's Forest City, Ark., despatch says: This city was horrified at 2.10 o'clock this afternoon by the most terrible tragedy in the history of the county. For several days excitement has been high over the school election, and A. M. Neely and G. W. Ingram (both colored) have been making incendiary speeches, advocating the ousting of the whites from the control of school affairs. Neely has been a disturbing element in the politics of this county for some time, having almost absolute control of the negroes. To-day a large crowd assembled at the junction of Washington and Front streets, in the vicinity of the polls. The exact origin of the trouble cannot, in consequence of the terrible excitement, be ascertained. It seems Neely had a fight with a white man and was knocked down by a bystander. He then ran to Captain John Parham for protection. Marshal M. Folbre interfered and commanded the peace. Thomas Parham, son of John Parham, heard the disturbance and came running downstairs from the County Clerk's office, where he is employed as a deputy, with a pistol in his hand. He saw the Marshal and his father close together talking excitedly, and raised the pistol and fired, the ball striking Folbre in the back of the head. In falling Folbre raised his pistol and fired two shots. Tom Parham fell mortally wounded and died in a short time. Sheriff D. M. Wilson came running to the scene, when a stray ball struck him, piercing his heart and killing him instantly. His only words were, "I am a dead man." It is supposed a ball from Neely's pistol killed the sheriff. Captain John Parham is thought to be wounded, but he refuses to allow the wound to be examined. Wilson and Parham are what is known as Fusionists. Three of the best men in the county were seen lying murdered upon the street at the same time. The cries of the afflicted families were heartrending, women from every part of the town rushed through the streets, searching for husbands and brothers. G. W. Ingram, who is coroner of the county, was waited on by the citizens this afternoon and invited to leave town, which he did on the 6 o'clock train.

AN AWFUL POSSIBILITY.

Was Mind Reader Bishop Dead Before He Was Carved?

A New York despatch says: The wife and mother of Washington Irving Bishop, the mind reader, have arrived in this city, and both claim that Bishop was not dead, but merely in a trance when the physicians made their post-mortem examination, and that his death was caused by the surgical instruments. It seems that but four hours elapsed from the time of his reported death until Drs. Irwin, Ferguson and House were making a post-mortem examination of the body. The widow of the mind reader states that he has suffered several times from cataleptic attacks, and has lain in a trance, apparently dead, for periods varying from six to fifty-two hours. On one occasion in Malta, she says, physicians pronounced him dead, and advised preparations for his interment. His friends held a different belief, and in a little over two days he recovered. About two years ago Bishop, while suffering with a dangerous illness, was treated by Dr. Thomas S. Robertson, of No. 28 east Twentieth street, this city. While at the doctor's house he had a cataleptic attack, and remained in a trance-like condition for two days. The physicians who performed the autopsy, however, say there can be no donbt of Bishop's death before the autopsy was decided upon.

Boy Burned to a Crisp.

A Moncton, N.B., special says: A child, 5 years old, son of a shoemaker named McGeary, was burned to death here at noon yesterday. The attic of the two-story tenement in which McGeary lived was found to be on fire. When the firemen reached the scene, Mrs. McGeary, crazed with grief, was shouting that her child was in the attic. The place was filled with fire and smoke and a search was unavailable. Shortly afterward, the flames being partly subdued, the child was found under the attic, where the fire evidently had its origin in a pile of straw. The child was burned almost to a crisp and presented a dreadful appearance. It was with difficulty that Mrs. McGeary was got away from the burning building. It is supposed the child set fire to the straw while playing with matches. There was not much damage to the building.

An Eloping Rector's Honeymoon.

A Syracuse despatch says: Rev. Charles Kimball, rector of the Episcopal Church at Oriskany Falls, N.Y., and Mrs. Kimball are stopping at the Empire House here on their honeymoon. Mrs. Kimball was Miss Fannie Putnam, of Oriskany Falls, and she eloped with the rector last Saturday night, her friends being opposed to the match. She was the belle of the town, 19 years old, and is wealthy. Mr. Kimball is to be ordained a priest at St. Paul's Cathedral here on May 29th.

Queer Antics of a Condemned Man.

Kemmler, who has just been sentenced at Buffalo to death by electricity, is reported to be taking matters very coolly. He is heartily in favor of electricity and thinks such a death preferable to hanging. The man is quite jovial, and sings and dances occasionally, the songs being his own composition and the jig-steps decidedly eccentric. He is not a successful converser, and has said but little since the sentence.

While Henri Rochefort, accompanied by friends, was walking in Regent street, London, on Saturday night, he met M. Pilotel. Angry words were exchanged and Pilotel threatened to strike Rochefort unless he assented to a duel. Rochefort drew a revolver and was about to fire at Pilotel, when a bystander seized the weapon. A policeman arrested the men and took them to the station, where Pilotel charged Rochefort with assault. The revolver was found fully charged. Rochefort was bailed.

Barry Koehler, while crazed with drink, ran amuck through the streets of Joliet, Ill., on Friday night and shot and seriously wounded a young lady, Delia Hart. A crowd gathered and began to search for him among some freight cars. A freight train moved past, and at the open door of one of the cars a man was seen. The crowd called out that it was Koehler, and an excited policeman fired at him, inflicting a fatal wound in the head. Then it was discovered that the wounded man was Wm. Hanson, of Chicago, who was on his way to Oklahoma. Koehler was captured next morning.

The autopsy on the body of Washington Irving Bishop was made on Saturday by Depnty Coroner Jenkins. There were also present Deputy Coroner Weston, Dr. Biggs and Dr. Ferguson, who made the original autopsy. The examination, so far as was possible to be made that day, did not reveal the cause of death. Dr. Jenkins, however, removed various particles of the vital organs, a microscopical examination of which is expected to settle the matter of whether or not the mind reader died under the post-mortem knife. Drs. Hamilton, Janeway and Spitzka, who were expected to be present, did not attend the autopsy. The last-named physician is said to have declared that it is impossible to solve the mystery at this late time.

General Boulanger quite well in London, in spite of reports from Paris to the contrary. He is making his way in society, but has not yet dined with a Cabinet Minister. The smaller fry of the Government, Mr. Yalkes, Mr. Marriott and Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, may sit down with him, but when Lord Cross found the General at the Baroness Burdett-Coutts' table, Lord Cross rose and fled, so powerful is the frown of the French Embassy. People ask why the Baroness took up the General and launched him after he had been in association with the Irish Left at the House of Commons. It is whispered in reply that the Baroness hates the Republic. General Boulanger has the rare knack of fascinating all the women with wealth.

The little girls attending the third grade in the Jefferson Public School, Washington, were standing in the aisles yesterday afternoon preparing to go home, when their teacher, Mrs. Sarah E. Allen, was fatally shot in their presence by her worthless husband, who then killed himself. Allen had been supported by his wife until recently, when she left him on account of his dissipated habits and frequent abuse and violence. The uproar which followed the killing caused quite a panic in the other school-rooms. The children rushed downstairs pellmell, knocking over one another, but doing no injury. The fire engines were summoned by one pupil.

The Future of France.

Max O'Rell, in an interview on Saturday, said: The French are approaching one of their historical crises, which occur at intervals, but the new master will not be Boulanger. The Communists may triumph for a time. Then will follow a Cæsar, but he will not be Boulanger. The Comte de Paris is the man, even if he has to wait ten or twenty years. An English lady moving in the highest circles said Boulanger will never move in the best English society, quoting as an example the fact that three-fourths of those Lord Randolph Churchill invited to meet him at a dinner refused the invitation.

As to a Franco-German war, France will not take the initiative. Her millions of peasants know too well what war means. The real danger lies in the excitable and erratic character of the German Emperor. His violent nature at any moment may make Europe burst into war. France is far stronger and better prepared than is supposed, particularly in great artillery. Certainly no nation in Europe can command her financial resources.

REALMS OF MAGIC.

How the Magicians Do the Tricks Which Coin Them Fortunes.

The Mysteries of Black Art—Exposure of the Famous Rabbit Trick—How Echo Plays the Cornet and Psycho Finds Square Roots—Astarte and the Skeleton Hand.

(New York Correspondence.)

There are few individuals connected with the stage who to-day are "doing better" than the magical personage.

The "Dabbler in Black Art," the "Famous Prestidigitateur," the "Marvellous Illusionist," the "Modern Wizard," as he fondly and variously styles himself, has in the past couple of seasons been reaping a fat financial harvest.

The American public, a cynic has said, dearly loves humbug.

Nobody has a bigger corner on this commodity than the magical personage, and he deals out his accumulated stock against heavy cash returns.

To the average spectator sitting through a performance of the "professor" it doubtless appears that some really astounding feats have been performed—that some marvels verging on the supernatural have been evolved.

And, as a matter of fact, he has witnessed some really astounding feats—astounding in their very simplicity and in the audacity of their conception and carrying out

Explain to the spectator any one of the magician's tricks and he forthwith passes into three stages of astonishment. First, astonishment as to the almost silly simplicity of the trick; second, astonishment as to how he could ever have been deceived by such a silly, simple trick; third, astonishment as to how the "professor" could ever have had the audacity to attempt to deceive him by such a direfully silly, simple trick.

Oh, yes! It's awfully silly after you once discover how it's done.

The most important stock in trade needed by the magical person is unlimited audacity. What is known among "the boys" as boundless, brazen, unmitigated "cheek."

Add to this a good flow of small talk and some practice at sleight-of-hand, and the requirements for the business are pretty well complete.

And now step down to the footlights, Professor!

Don't be bashful!

Let us take a peep at you from behind the scenes and see how a few of your "wonderful feats," some of your "extraordinary marvels," are done.

The performance usually opens with some pure and simple sleight-of-hand tricks, such as taking a quantity of handkerchiefs out of the silk hat of the bald headed man in the third row, or extracting a number of silver dollars from the hair, the noses or the knees of various members of the audience. All this simply depends upon sleight-of-hand, upon the scientific axiom that the hand if moved rapidly enough can travel faster than the eye can follow. Some of these tricks are decidedly interesting to watch, and are the most honest part of the entertainment, for their performance is dependent upon hard practice and sheer dexterity and skill.

THE MYSTIC HAND.

The appearance of the "Skeleton Hand" or the "Mystic Hand," as it is variously styled, usually marks the first stage when plain dexterity and skill step out and chicanery comes in. The "Mystic Hand" is a hand which the "Professor" takes from the back of the stage and lays upon a table near the footlights. He then steps down into the audience with a dice box and requests somebody to shake the dice. This having been done, the "Mystic Hand" proceeds to rap out upon the table the sum total of the throw.

The "Professor" throws the dice back into the box, steps over to another spectator and requests him to throw. Again, amid the hushed silence of the house, the hand slowly raises itself up and down and raps out the number. The "Professor" steps back on the stage amid loud applause—whether for himself or for the "Mystic Hand" is not clearly apparent.

How is it done?

Excessively simple. The "Mystic Hand" is connected by a thin, invisible wire with the fleshly hand of an operator behind the scenes. He works the raps.

But how does he know what the throw will be?

Again very simple! The dice are loaded. They will only fall a certain way. After the first throw, while stepping over to the second spectator, the "Professor," by sleight-of-hand changes the first set for a second set of loaded dice, and thus the hidden operator is enabled to direct the "Mystic Hand" to rap out the second throw as correctly as the first.

But what if a spectator should ask to make a number of throws?

The "Professor" depends upon his tact and quickness of passing from one trick to the other to obviate anything of that kind. He has, it is true, a third set of loaded dice in the event of such a contingency, but in an ordinary way if more than three throws were tried the "Mystic Hand" would be "stuck." It is contrary to etiquette to insist upon a trick being done too often.

ECHO AND PSYCHO.

On similar lines to the "Mystic Hand" are the two wonder provoking automatons recently seen in this city—the one playing any popular air selected by the audience upon a cornet, the other picking out from numbers placed in a rack in front of its automatic hand the square root of any number named by the audience.

Let us call the cornetist Echo, the mathematician Psycho.

The magician places each of these figures upon a hollow glass cylinder, so that the audience may see, he declares, that "there is nothing at work underneath them." Audacious magician! He boldly draws attention to a fact as non-existing which really exists. Through that hollow glass cylinder run a number of invisible wires and tubes. A dumb cornet is played beneath the stage by the magician's pretty assistant and the wind supplied by her is carried through a tube to the instrument at Echo's lips. In the same way whenever she presses a key of her instrument the same movement is conveyed through the wires to Echo's fingers and the corresponding key of his instrument is pressed down. Thus it is that Echo plays the cornet.

With Psycho the modus operandi differs only in detail.

Somebody in the audience selects a number of which Psycho is to find the square root. The "Professor," standing on the stage, repeats in a loud voice the number, adding, "Now, Psycho, find me the square root of that!" Beneath the stage is an assistant with a number of arithmetical charts setting forth the square root of any given number. He turns to these charts, rapidly finds the number, and by means of an air pump supplies the necessary power to Psycho's hand to pick out the required numbers from the cards in the rack before her. In front of the operator is a dummy figure of Psycho, which works precisely as the figure above, so that he can see just what he is doing.

THE RABBIT TRICK.

But interesting as are these automatons their feats awaken nothing like the speculation and enthusiasm that does the famous rabbit trick with which another well known magician usually closes the first act of his performances. The rabbit trick is as follows: The "Professor" takes two young rabbits which he passes around among the audience, so that people may see for themselves that the animals are really alive.

Convincing proof of this fact having been given and the rabbits having been handed back to the "Professor," he proceeds to rub them slowly and laboriously together. Suddenly he holds up his hand, and the spectators discover to their amazement that the two long, thin rabbits have been rubbed into one short, fat rabbit.

This phenomena invariably elicits a roar of laughter. Before the echoes of this laughter have died away the "Professor" raises a pistol, levels it at the audience and blazes away. Crack! A few shrieks from the ladies, and, presto! the amalgamated rabbit in the "Professor's" hand has disappeared.

General astonishment and a pause of suspense. Where, in the name of all that is mysterious, can bunnie have gone?

The "Professor" rushes down from the stage.

"I want my rabbit back, sir," he cries, sternly, to a man in the audience

The individual addressed grumbles some unintelligible disclaimer.

"Give me back that rabbit," commands the man of magic, more sternly than ever

Another grumbled reply.

"Since you will not give him back to me quietly I will take him by force!"

And the "Professor" precipitates himself upon the man, and in a twinkling drops from beneath his coat the amalgamated rabbit. It is the same rabbit! There is no mistaking that! See the two black spots on his white back!

The man from whom the rabbit has been taken gapes in open-mouthed astonishment. He is a picture of confusion and dismay. As for the spectators, they shout themselves hoarse.

A mighty clever trick!

Two living rabbits rubbed into one, the dual rabbit made to disappear on the open stage and then recovered in the inside pocket of a gentleman in the audience!

That the "Professor" concealed either one or both of the rabbits up the tight fitting sleeve of his well fitting dress coat is only too obviously impossible.

How, then, did he manage it?

It is perfectly inexplicable.

Some weeks ago in the Park Theatre, in Brooklyn, a gentleman in the audience evidently conceived that he had an inkling of how the trick was done. He rose from his seat and declared that in his opinion the audience had been imposed upon; that the person from whose clothing the rabbit had been taken was a confederate who had come into the theatre loaded with the game.

The "Professor" indignantly declared it was nothing of the kind.

Ah, indeed! If this was so would the "Professor" repeat his trick.

No, certainly not. The "Professor" never repeated his tricks. It was a standing rule with him.

Just so. A very healthy standing rule for the "Professor," for he could not repeat the trick.

At this point the audience was on the tiptoe of excitement and expectancy and the "Professor" was wrought up to a high pitch. He proceeded to gird up his loins for battle.

No, he declared, he would not repeat his trick—that is, for nothing. But since the gentleman was so sure of his point, if he liked to lay a wager of $100 that the trick could not be repeated the "Professor" would consent to reproduce it. If he failed the "Professor" would forfeit $100, the amount of the winning in either event to be donated to any Brooklyn charity which Colonel Sinn, the manager of the theatre, might select.

The gentleman was not to be bluffed With the greatest alacrity he accepted the wager. The house went wild with excitement.

The "Professor" retired to the stage and called for two rabbits, which were brought him. Slowly, and with great difficulty, he rubbed them together, and finally blended them into one. He handed it down for inspection. There was no mistaking—there was only one rabbit there.

So far the first part of the trick was successful.

Once more the "Professor" took possession of his rabbit and retired to the stage. Slowly he raised his pistol in the air Bang! The rabbit had vanished.

With one spring the "Professor" was down among the audience. Down the aisle he rushed, and made straightway for the man who had challenged him.

"You have my rabbit, sir—you—you!"

And tearing open the man's coat without ceremony, the "Professor" dragged forth the missing rabbit.

Never did mortal man show greater bewilderment and amazement. Never did an audience laugh and applaud and cheer more boisterously than that audience.

A really marvellous feat, that rabbit trick! How on earth is it done?

Again, very simple!

HOW IT IS DONE.

The material needed to perform the trick consists of a strip of black velvet and three rabbits.

Two of the rabbits ought to have a more or less close family resemblance.

A slight observation of the rabbit tribe will lead to the conviction that it is not very difficult to find a couple of bunnie cousins each of which has a white back with a couple of black spots upon it, or a black back with a couple of white dots upon it, and are at the same time much about of a size.

Now, the fact has of late been discovered by magicians that a strip of black velvet placed across the stage will be utterly invisible to the audience on the other side of the footlights. All that is necessary to render the black velvet invisible to the audience is to prevent any side lights being thrown upon the stage and to keep the footlights burning at their full brightness.

When the "Professor" begins rubbing his two rabbits together, he gradually approaches them to the edge of the strip of black velvet, and holding the body of one rabbit so that it will for a moment conceal the body of its companion, he quietly drops the second rabbit behind the strip of velvet, and it disappears from view. A rabbit is a very elastic bit of goods. Its body can be readily drawn out to great length so as to look thin and attenuated, or can be rolled up into a short, pussy little mass. To add to the illusion of the two rabbits having been rubbed into one, the "Professor" gives the remaining rabbit a little professional squeeze at the base of the body, and bunny suddenly presents the appearance of being very short and squat.

The next thing the "Professor" does is to fire his pistol. Now, the effect of firing a pistol is to cause an involuntary and momentary winking of the eyelids of the spectators. At the instant that the detonation rings forth and the involuntary wink takes place the quick hand of the "Professor" drops the second rabbit, like the first, behind the invisible strip of black velvet, and it is lost to view.

The "Professor" then rushes down into the audience and finds the missing rabbit in the pocket of a spectator.

How did it get there?

It has been there all along. It is the third rabbit bearing a family likeness to the second one. The man came into the theatre with it in his pocket. It is astonishing into what a small compass a young rabbit will fit, and how he will expand and look large when drawn forth. The man with the game is of course a confederate.

How, then, was it that upon the occasion of the Park Theatre incident the "Professor" was not confounded and exposed?

For a very good reason.

Just this. The challenger was also a confederate. He, too, was loaded with game. It was simply a very pretty little [illegible]

THE INVISIBLE VELVET.

Speaking of black velvet, all the feats performed in the widely advertised "black art" exhibited during the past season in this city by each of two well-known magicians are accomplished through this agency. The stage is darkened, but the footlights are left burning brilliantly. Broad strips of black velvet run here and there across the stage, with passages between them so as to allow of the movements back and forth of the magician. Behind these strips of velvet, which are absolutely invisible to persons on the other side of the footlights, no matter in what part of the house they may be, are assistants completely enveloped from the crowns of their heads to the soles of their feet in black velvet. They can move about as they will and be utterly invisible to the audience.

The magician, usually clothed in white, invokes Mephistopheles to appear. Mephistopheles is standing only a few feet away from him on the stage, holding a barrier of black velvet between himself and the audience. The moment the words conjuring him to come forth are uttered he lets fall the barrier of velvet, and presto! he appears to the audience as if he had dropped from the skies or had been evoked from the surrounding air. The illusion is highly effective and positively startling.

A lady is next commanded to materialize. She forthwith appears in the same way and under the same conditions that Mephistopheles has appeared—that is, she simply drops the barrier of black velvet that has been concealing her. Watch closely and you will notice that the head of the apparition always appears first.

"Offer the lady a seat," commands Mephistopheles.

"I have no seat to offer her," replies the magician.

"Yes you have."

"Where?"

"There."

And at the cue "there!" one of the black robed assistants evolves the required seat from behind one of the strips of black velvet, giving to it a peculiar vacillating motion so as to lend to it the illusion that it is slowly drifting through the air.

In the same way goblets, snakes, balls and a variety of other articles are made to appear, and when they are required to disappear they are simply wafted back by the assistant or assistants to their places of concealment behind the black velvet. If it is desired to move a woman's head detached from the trunk across the stage all that is necessary is to cover her with black velvet up to the throat. Her head then only will be visible, and as the magician takes it between his hands and moves across the stage, followed by the body concealed behind the velvet, the illusion to the audience will be complete that a bodyless head is before them.

Such is the famous "black art," or, more correctly speaking, the great black velvet act.

ASTARTE.

Few illusions have attracted more general attention than that known as Astarte, which was recently produced amid a great flourish of trumpets at Dockstader's, in this city. Astarte is a girl who walks back and forth through space, and turns somersaults in the air without any visible means of support.

Nothing very wonderful about that, is the thought of the audience. She is suspended by wire, of course.

But the "Professor" has a surprise in store for them. It is he himself who first gives audible expression to the suspicion of his audience.

"You think Astarte is dependent upon wires," he remarks. "Well, you shall see for yourselves."

And he hands Astarte a large ornamental hoop.

Astarte takes the hoop and whirls it above her head and under her feet, just as a girl uses a skipping rope.

The spectators have been given a genuine surprise. They are thoroughly taken aback. There certainly can be no wires there.

But there are wires, just the same, or more strictly speaking, steel supports, which hold her up at the waist and are connected with an upright placed behind a barrier of black velvet. The upright rests upon a truck, also concealed by the black velvet, which is moved backward and forward as the movements of Astarte may require. By closely watching Astarte after an energetic movement the dancing movement imparted to her frame by the steel spring which forms a part of the supporting apparatus may plainly be discovered.

But how is it, then, that the hoop passes through the wire or steel connecting her with the cross-beam of the supporting upright?

How, indeed!

A solid circle or hoop must certainly stop when it is brought in contact with the supporting line.

Yes, a solid hoop certainly would.

But the trouble with this hoop that Astarte whirls about her is that it is not solid. It is a split hoop. At one portion of it—the portion which strikes the supporting line—there is a long, easy working catch. Whenever the hoop sharply strikes the supporting line this catch flies back and allows the hoop to pass through.

Let somebody take a solid iron hoop to the theatre and invite Astarte to whirl that about her airy form. A revolution will ensue—but not on the part of the hoop.

THE BASKET MYSTERY.

The "basket mystery," in which a child is placed in a basket through which a sword is then driven while the child is heard shrieking inside, is a much simpler mechanical contrivance than that of "Astarte." The basket employed is a double basket, which is so devised that there is ample room for the child to conceal itself between the outer and the inner basket. When the lid is opened in a certain way the child is entirely concealed from the audience. All a person has to do is to carefully watch the lid of the basket and he will readily perceive where the child is concealed.

Our Children's Eyes.

A mother sends the following kindly, wise words: Allow me to say a few words in regard to the children's eyes. Years ago, when the children studied their lessons from their books, we did not hear very much about their eyes giving out. Let us consult our blackboards and see what they can tell us about this world-wide subject. Dear parents and guardians all over this broad land, how many hours through the day are your little children sitting in school staring at a blackboard, upon which are placed by the teacher most of the lessons for the day, many times the lines being so fine and pale they could not be easily read more than half or two-thirds the way across the room, but the children are required to see them all the way across and from the remotest corners. Many of the children when first looking at the board do not see much of anything, but by looking very sharp for a few seconds the lines reveal themselves. This, my friend, means weakened or diseased optic nerves, possibly no eyes at all, it all depending upon the severity of the strain. Even when the work is quite distinct, for children who have naturally weak eyes the distance many times is so great that the air waves coming between the poor, tired eyes and the board cause the lines to waver and flicker, and especially is this the case when the light is poor and the ventilation bad. Anything put on the board for children to see, whether old or young, should have large proportions and broad, clear lines throughout, so no extra efforts will have to be made to discover it. There is a great difference in eyes: one child will readily see what another could not without the fatal strain. I know whereof I speak, for my own eyes were nearly destroyed through this same practice, and I know others who have suffered a like fate

A Strange Prayer.

A Hartford clergyman tells this anecdote: Early in life, while occupying another charge, he invited a clergyman whom the unregenerated would call conceited and dull to preach in his pulpit. During the sermon our Hartford preacher dozed away in the sweet old way till he was suddenly called on to conclude the service with prayer. Accustomed to regard himself as the humblest of his Creator's instruments, and forgetting that he had not delivered the sermon, he began with "We beseech thee to accept the weak and feeble effort that has been addressed to Thee, and more richly to endow Thy servant in the graces he so greatly lacks."—Hartford Courant.

Every drop of blood in the system passes through both kidneys and lungs many thousand times in each twenty-four hours. This explains why 52 per cent. of the patients of Brompton Hospital, for Consumptives, London, England, have unsuspected kidney disorder. If the kidneys were in a healthy condition they would expel the waste matter or poisonous acid and prevent the irritation of the lungs. But if diseased they are unable to perform their functions. This explains why Warner's Safe Cure has proved so valuable in cases of lung trouble. It removes the cause.

BLIND BRIDAL COUPLE.

Touching Story of a Man and Wife Who Never Saw Each Other.

Every pleasant evening, in that hour just before twilight which we all love to idle away with inconsequential thoughts and observations, there passes my window a couple that greatly interests me, says a writer in the Toledo Blade. The lady is but a young girl, it seems, and she has such a pretty face, so white and peaceful, with something of sadness in it, something of joy. She has great eyes that stare strangely at you, and at the sound of her companion's voice their lids are drooped, and the long, graceful eyelashes fall upon her cheeks. The man reminds me of one of the old Saxons. He is big and strong, and has the curly golden hair and the big blonde beard of that race of men. His companion hangs on his arm, and yet he seems to depend upon her as much as she on him, for they cling very closely indeed together, while he carefully picks their way out with a light cane. Both are blind. I inquired about them the other day. Neither ever saw the light of day. Neither can ever know how glorious the sunlight is, how prettily blend the beautiful hues of the flowers, how grand all nature looks. Neither ever saw the other. And yet they are a bridal pair. They only live in a world of darkness and in each other. They met long ago, became devotedly attached to each other, and were married. And so now every evening when the weather is fine they go out for a little stroll, and as they slowly, carefully walk past my window I think, "It is a sad and yet pretty sight—a bridal pair."

A Millionaire in a Minute.

Instances are on record where toilers in gold mines and diamond fields, who, by one turn of a spade, a single movement of the hand, have been transformed from penniless laborers to millionaires. But they were not so lucky as is the consumptive who finds a means of restoration to health, who learns that the dread disease from which he suffers is not incurable. Dr Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery will cure consumption which is lung scrofula, and nothing else will. For all diseases of the blood, such as blotches, pimples, eruptions, scrofulous sores and swellings, it is unequaled. It is guaranteed to cure in all cases of diseases for which it is recommended, or money paid for it will be promptly refunded

The 24th.

Her Majesty's glorious birthday passed off very quietly to the natives of Flesherton as a rule. Scores of them went fishing but "sneaked" their loads (l) of fish in by the back door upon returning at night. Even Tommy Hollinger had no remarkable catch to chronicle. The day was cloudy and very cool. Towards evening a heavy mist settled over the land and made the weather disagreeable However, upon the whole, we believe everyone enjoyed themselves as well as circumstances would permit. The two Advance "foremen" launched a boat on Flesher's mill pond, which did not attract quite so many spectators as did the launch of the Manitoba, and some young men fired off a box of fireworks in front of Munshaw's hotel at 10 o'clock in the morning. These, we believe, were the only really exciting incidents of the day.

Sudden Death.

On Wednesday morning of last week Mrs. Hurlburt, of Kimberley, passed quietly away to her eternal rest. Deceased has been a resident of Kimberley for about ten years, and during that time she has won the respect of all who knew her She was a member of the Methodist Church and was always found in her place at the time of worship when she was able to attend. During the past few months she had not been in good health but nothing serious was expected until a few days before she died. A few minutes before she passed away she seemed quite well but took suddenly ill and in a few minutes fell asleep. Some time before she died she said she was glad she had been enabled to endure to the end; she was happy in Jesus; trusting in His atoning blood, she could say, as Paul said, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course," etc. Deceased was 75 years old and has lived in this country for many years Rev. Mr. Watts preached the funeral sermon from the fifteenth verse of the 116th Psalm: "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints." Mr. Watts impressed upon the minds of the congregation the necessity of being ready when the Son of Man cometh. The funeral took place on Friday from her late residence to the cemetery in the neighborhood where she formerly lived in St. Vincent. COM.

New England Weather.

Mark Twain reverently believed that the Maker who made us all makes everything in New England but the weather. Now the natives of Flesherton would like to have Mark drop around and pass an opinion on the weather we have been having here lately. For a magnificent, mild, balmy, seductive spring, ours of this year could not be beaten until within the last week or so. It had its lines about the first of March for a big April fool. It put on a blossoming, blooming face that brought out the native perspiration and Indian muslin, started the flowers to bloom and cajoled those individuals who monkey with the flora and fauna into setting out their tomato plants, cucumbers, and other tendeushrubs and flowers So soon as it got these well in the ground this blooming weather with a fiendish shriek turned its back upon us and a blood-curdling coolness developed on its part. It wielded its sword, too, and cut off in their prime the innocent plants and flowers; it snowed and blowed, and sneezed, and snarled, and snorted, just like an energetic politican in prime condition. The people in a body are now imitating its sneezing, snarling and snorting. The Advance humbly offers the opinion that Mark was right, and that ours is an edition of that New England weather which has been smuggled into Canada without the duty having being paid. Will the custom house authorities please see to it that it is confiscated before any more moral damage is done to the native article.

We are obliged to hold over an interesting budget of news from our Balsam Valley correspondent until next week.

Wedded.

On Tuesday evening Rev. Mr. McLeod, of Priceville, performed the ceremony of uniting in marriage Mr. D. McTavish to Miss Jane Stewart, daughter of Mr. Geo. Mr. and Mrs. McTavish have the warmest wishes of The Advance for future happiness.

District Meeting

The district meeting held in the Methodist Church last Wednesday, was composed of the following ministers and laymen viz.:—Flesherton, Rev. J.W. Shilton and M. Richardson, Esq.; Markdale, Rev. O. Buggin and W. Irwin; Dundalk, Rev. W H. Moss and T. Hanbury; Melancthon, Rev. R.C. Burton and Mark Williams; Priceville, Rev. W. Ottewell and C.C. James; Eugenia, Rev. J. H. Watts and J. Sloan; Holland Centre, Rev. Geo. Hartley and Mr. Jamieson; Walter's Falls, Rev. J. W. Sanderson and A.E. Thornley, with J. Bowes Jr. and Mr.——; Euphrasia, Rev. R. J. Hosking and D.R. Ellis. The business was chiefly of a routine character. All the members upon moral examination were found blameless in life. Some changes were recommended in the circuit domains, chiefly affecting Markdale, Euphrasia and Walter's Falls. The various connexional funds were in advance of last year as a whole. Rev. J. W. Sanderson and Rev. Geo. Hartley were elected secretaries. Rev. J. W. Shilton, B.A., represents the district on the stationing committee, and Rev. J. Hartley and M. Richardson, Esq., on the Sabbath S. committee. The laymen elected to conference were Messrs. W. Irwin, M. Richardson, Dr. Christoe, T. Hanbury, R. Slack, J. Sloan, C. C. James, J. Bowes, Jr., D.R. Ellis and another from Holland Centre. The Advance and hostesses entertaining the delegates received the thanks of the meeting for kindnesses shown.

Concert.

The concert held in the Town Hall on Friday evening, under the auspices of the Presbyterian Ladies Aid was a pronounced success in one sense, but in another sense it was not. The entertainment provided was good, with one or two exceptions, but the audience was surely not a representative one of the Presbyterian Church here. We would be sorry to think it was so. There were not a large number present, but fully one half of those who were there were outsiders. Why cannot people at least patronize their own church to the extent of 15 cents occasionally, and for their own good? Rev. Mr. Emes gracefully officiated in the chair. The Flesherton Glee Club provided a large portion of the program, and were never in better form. Their selections were heartily and deservingly encored. Master Ed. Richardson surprised his own friends by the manner in which he sang "Committed to the Deep." Mr. Evans also sang a solo, and his magnificent voice was fully appreciated by the audience. Flesherton has some wonderful musical talent, and she also has numerous well-informed critics who do not pose as singers themselves, and the latter were all unanimous in deciding that the music provided was really good. Mrs. W. Irwin rendered a recitation in a most excellent manner, and was heartily applauded. In laughable comparison to hers was the attempted recitation of the editor of this paper. He failed most ignominously, and after floundering helplessly through two verses, apologized and took his seat. We know before that we were no polished elocutionist, but this brought it home with a disagreeable force that fairly "knocked us silly." Had we been the audience this item on the program would have tickled us immensely. As it was the enjoyment on our part was not quite so keen. Right here we might mention Mr. Johnston's singing of "I'll take you home again Kathleen," and "Good-bye sweetheart, good-bye." Honestly we believe the audience enjoyed our recitation more than Mr. Johnston's singing. Rev. Mr. Shilton gave a short address, replete with golden gems of wisdom. Miss Bella Christoe, Miss Maud Richardson, Miss Aikenhead, of Toronto, and Mr. J. G. Russell were also soloists. Miss Aikenhead has a good voice and her solo was much enjoyed. A vote of thanks was passed to those who kindly assisted with the program, and the concert closed with "God Save the Queen. The proceeds amounted to $13.

Special Announcement.

We have made arrangements with Dr B. J. Kendal Co., publishers of "A Treatise of the Horse and his Diseases" which will enable all our subscribers to obtain a copy of the valuable work free by sending their address (enclosing a two-cent stamp for mailing same) to Dr. B.J. Kendall Co., Enosburgh Falls, Vt. This book is now recognized as standard authority upon all diseases of the horse, as its phenomenal sale attests, over four million copies have been sold in the past ten years, a sale never before reached by any publication in the same period of time. We feel confident that our patrons will appreciate the work, and be glad to avail themselves of this opportunity of obtaining a valuable book.

It is necessary that you mention this paper in sending for the "Treatise." This offer will remain open for only a short time.

TO CALIFORNIA.

A Lady's Trip to the Golden State via C. P. R.

Graphic Description of the Scenery from North Bay to Rat Portage--Sunday on Board.

As you are already aware we left F. on Thursday morning, April 11th for Toronto, via. C.P.R. On our arrival there we repaired to the C.P.R. offices on King street where we completed arrangements for trip. After having ascertained time of starting, party going, etc., we then made good use of our time the remainder of that day and next in calling on friends to say farewell, as we were to leave at 11 p.m. Friday night.

On our arrival at Union Station with friends who accompanied us, we were agreeably surprised to see among the throng familiar faces of friends from Georgetown and Hastings, who, being in the city, and hearing of our leaving for the far west, had come down to see us off. Here we were introduced to the travelling passenger agent, who was to look after the party during the journey, and then taken to the car. On entering we found it neatly and tastefully fitted up with every accomodation for our use during the trip. Having said the last goodbye, we found ourselves slowly moving out of the station, and then for the first time began to fully realize that we were leaving home,friends and native land, and being strangers among strangers. However, the bustle going on around us, of arranging berths, dropping curtains, etc., soon drew our attention to the performance of the same duty. Finally quietness reigned supremely throughout the car. About 1 a.m. being somewhat wearied, I soon fell asleep, but only for a short time, as the motion of the train had a tendency to waken rather than lull us to sleep. About 5 o'clock a.m. most of the passengers commenced moving around, so that ended our slumbers for that night. We breakfasted about 7.30 a.m., after which we commenced to take notice of the country through which we were passing. We were now in Algoma district, having passed through the towns of Barrie, Orillia, Bracebridge and Gravenhurst, as well as smaller places during the night. We arrived at north Bay about 8.30 o'clock, when we were informed we should have to wait for the train from Montreal which had to be attached to ours. On account of some delay along that line it didn't arrive until 4.30 p.m. This gave us ample time to explore the town which is pleasantly situated on Lake Nippising, a beautiful and extensive sheet of water stretching away to our left, still solidly frozen over, so much so that men with their teams are seen driving over it, while to the right lay the town with the dust flying on the streets and no sign of winter whatever, and evidently none for several weeks back. We were informed the population was 1100. It contains many fine buildings. In our walk around the town we were surprised to see such a small place have so many hotels, as we counted eight. Whether there were any more or not we failed to discover. Some of them were very fine buildings. On the other hand we saw but two churches, and those of the most inferior style. A pretty strong evidence, we thought, Bacchus was most worshipped there While detained here we were entertained by a band of Scotch pipers who helped to pass away the time. However, we had a very pleasant party on board,all from Ontario, and although entire strangers to each other, soon became acquainted, and each one did his best to make the journey as pleasant and agreeable for the other as possible. After leaving North Bay we pass through a wild region where lakes, rivers, forests and rocky ridges alternate Night coming on shuts this out from our view. Before retiring for the night, (Saturday), we discovered we had two gentlemen (brothers) on board who were splendid singers, and who gave us several fine selections. Having become somewhat used to the motion of the train our slumbers were tranquil, and we awoke next morning feeling quite refreshed. We could not have wished for a more beautiful Sabbath. It was all that could be desired.

Heaven's whole arch
Was glorious with the sun's returning march
And woods were bright'ned, and soft gales
Went forth to kiss the sun-clad vales

As it drew near the hour for church we could tell by the remarks made that, as it was in our own case, so was it with most of the passengers, that home and friends occupied their thoughts. On making the remark to a gentleman from Toronto that our friends would likely be going to church now and thinking of us, tears filled his eyes as he replied, "I know mine will anyway," showing that gentlemen are not so indifferent to leaving home and friends as they would sometimes have us believe. We then formed a choir of all the singers we could find on board and sang several selections of popular hymns which were duly appreciated by all. This was again repeated in the evening. Sunday afternoon we commenced passing through some of the wildest scenery which we had yet beheld. We followed the Lake Superior shore for about 100 miles, here and there only catching glimpses of it sparkling in the sunlight with islands dotting its surface, and then again beholding it stretching for miles in its vastness. In some places we are riding along as it were a narrow shelf with massive walls of rocks towering hundreds of feet into the air on our right, with the lake in all its beauty of greenish blue water stretches right below to our left. There again we pass between walls of rock which we can almost touch as we pass along, by putting our hand through the window. Then suddenly we are emersed in darkness and hear exclamations from all sides of oh! oh oh! then before we have time to think of what has happened we emerge into daylight again. Then we know that we have passed through a tunnel. We are then informed we shall pass through several of those during the afternoon so we kept on a lookout for them. Just before entering the tunnel we come to what is called the Mink Trestle, where some three years ago a terrible accident took place in two trains colliding on it Over this the trains are only allowed to proceed at a certain rate of speed. We come to a standstill about a mile beyond the tunnel and find we have to go back over this dangerous piece of road and get up enough steam to take us over the heavy grade. Back we go round base of rocks, through tunnel, over trestle with a rush, as it is down grade, feeling at times as though we were flying through mid-air, slow up, stop, then try it again with greater speed. This time we are successful and are taken some four miles beyond. We have a fine view of the entire train as it often forms a semicircle in its windings around the base of rocks just here. We find on coming to another heavy grade our train has to be divided, as it is too heavy for the engine to take it, there being nineteen coaches with passengers besides dining car, mail, baggage, etc. Our car being about the centre of the train we were taken on about 10 miles and left at a small station called Middletown, while the engine returned for the remainder of the cars. We passed the time in climbing to a high point of rock which overlooked Lake Superior, so that we had a fine view of it

From here to Port Arthur the scenery is particularly interesting. Here we shall have to say with Longfellow:

"But at length the feverish day
Like a passion died away.
And the night, serene and still,
Fell on village, vale, and hill

We much regretted night surrounding us, especially as we were nearing Port Arthur, and would like to have seen this section of country by daylight. We arrived there about 1 o'clock a.m. and had the pleasure of seeing it by moonlight.

We would say again with the poet:

"Then the moon in all her pride,
Like a spirit glorified
Filled and overflowed the night
With the sweetness of her light

Some of the gentlemen starting up town were compelled to retrace their steps hurriedly by the whistle sounding as the train only remained a short time. From here to Rat Portage the scenery is of the wildest description. We are continually passing bold promontories, rocky uplifts, chains of rock, broad lakes, islands, over rivers, brooks, dashing cataract and waterfall, through deep cuttings, open plain, vast forests and around rugged mountains until we arrive at Rat Portage. For miles we pass through what has been great forests, but now nothing remains but the charred logs and trees bearing the mark of the destroying fire.

To be continued.

Osprey Items.

Gleaned by our own Reporter.

Osprey is still alive and situated amidst the same surroundings. Although

The autumn is past, and the winter is gone,
And the springtime has come with its bloom,
But those frosts reappearing after each rain
Cuts the young barley down rather soon

It is feared little fruit will be found in this vicinity if the above frosts continue.

But that has nothing to do with the way the 24th was celebrated in Osprey. The picnic over on the Eighth Line, lot 4, attracted quite a number. A good platform and first-class music,together with other games furnished ample amusement for all who had the pleasure of being there. In Maxwell the celebration, compared with announcements made on posters, was rather a slim affair.

Mr. McD. Williams has purchased and removed to his own store the entire stock of Mrs. Carr. Mr. W. evidently means business.

Mr. John Graham, although well advanced in years, has again entered the bonds of holy matrimony. Congratulations, Johnny.

In Feversham things look rather lively. The frame of the Orange Hall, 20x40, is erected, and will soon be completed.

Ira Perigo has secured the contract of building a new bridge over the pond.

C. E. Nail went to town last week and purchased a fine stock of goods for the summer.

The egg scavengers report the hen fruit a good crop.

I have set my house in order
For a stately step to grace;
I have bidden the mirrors keep record
Of a never forgotten face;
I have brightened with thrifty cunning
The walls of my sylvan home;
They are beautiful in the shadow
Of him who vouchsafes to come.

I have swept the leaves from the greensward,
And the gray stones twinkle and shine;
I have loosened each fretful tangle
Of the twisted cedar and vine;
I have ordered the waters waste not
Their splendors upon my eye,
But to wait, like my heart, for thy footsteps,
And a gush when thou drawest nigh.

Myself I would dress for thy presence;
But there I must stand and weep,
Since the years that teach Love's value
His vanishing treasures sweep.
But words that are spells or magic,
And merciful looks and ways,
Shall brighten the wasted features
That faded when none did praise.

Thou gracious and lordly creature,
Do the trees, when thou passest by,
Let down their fair arms to embrace thee,
And the flowers reach up to thine eye?
Do they wait, all athrill, when thou passest,
For a touch of thy life divine,
Do they fold their meek hands when thou fleetest,
And die for a breath of thine?

My heart has leapt forth to embrace thee;
It clings, like a babe, to thy breast;
And my blood is a storm-stirred ocean
That waits for the world of rest.
Time loses his paltry measure
Now that Love's eterne draws near,
And the long-ring moments that part us
Are endless in hope and fear.

Oh! what if, beyond thy sunshine,
Some gathering storm should brood?
Thy rapture, for-aking, shall leave me
Alone with God's orphanhood.
The heart thou hast blest so inly
Shall wait no inglorious breath,
Come hither, then, ye who walk twinly;
So enter here, Love and Death!

Julia Ward Howe.

ESTELLE'S INFATUATION:

A NOVEL.

Tears came into Caleb's eyes, but he did not speak. His heart in its own selfishness understood this waywardness, this ingratitude of the sick brain and sore soul. Still, it just for the moment stung him to hear this woman, for whom he would have died as patiently as he now served her, long for the advent of another friend who, she said, would be the Paraclete, the Comforter, he had tried to be and was not.

Estelle did not see his face. If she had, perhaps she would not have read it aright.

"But she isn't herself. My queenly lass, she isn't herself," said Caleb, in a low whisper, as he shambled to the gate of the cemetery for the carriage left standing there. "And I should be wrong to take notice of a chance word like this, which means naught but itself. And it's but natural, after all, that she wants one of her own sex and kind. For what am I but a hodmadod, good only to fetch and carry!"

And with his round red eyes still full of tears, he motioned the cocher to drive up to the gate, and then went back for Estelle.

"Tell her to come—to come at once," said Estelle.

It was the burden of her speech all the way home.

"I shall be so glad to see her! She will manage it for me. She would have made him a far better wife than I did. Perhaps she will marry him when he has made himself free as well as me. Only let her come! Oh, I wish she was here now!"

"A little patience, a few nights' sleep, Mrs Charles, and she'll be over the doorstep," said Caleb, encouragingly. "Don't put yourself about. She'll come by the first train she can get."

"And Charlie will be glad," said Estelle.

As she said this she shivered and put her hands before her eyes. The little child she had left to its fate and had almost forgotten suddenly seemed to rise in the air before her, as it had risen more than once before. "But she will take it," she said to herself; "and it never knew me, and never will regret me." Then, with a cry that was like something struck and wounded, she flung up her arms, and said: "All! All! I have lost all! Home, name, my child and my beloved, and the world says my virtue. But I had him, and he loved me. What do I care for the rest—even for the child—in comparison to him!"

But she broke into tears, and sobbed with a passion Caleb had never seen before.

With an impulse he did not care to command, he leant forward and took her hands.

"Mrs. Charles, I cannot have this," he said, a little more firmly than he was wont to speak to her, but with infinite tenderness and respect too. "It's just foolishness, this looking back. You'll do yourself a mischief by carrying on like this. What's done is done, and there is no good in grieving over spilt milk. Your true friends stick by you, whatever the world says; and you have never yet been slighted by them as knew. Let the rest pass. What are they to you?"

"How good you are!" said Estelle, after a pause. "What should I do without you, Mr. Stagg?"

"But poorly, I doubt," said Caleb, simply, feeling amply rewarded for all his heart-breaks, all his sacrifices and outlay, by this one brief acknowledgment of his services.

By that evening's post the letter to Lady Elizabeth was written, and Caleb took it to the office himself to make sure of its safety.

Truly was Estelle a fated woman—fated to work evil to men by her love and theirs as Helen of Troy, or that Serpent of old Nile whose kisses lighted flame and fire, and slew like sharp-edged swords—fated to work evil to herself, and to build her own funeral pyre out of the hearts she had broken.

CHAPTER VII.

THE BLOWING UP OF THE STORM.

A luncheon party was on hand at Thrift. Really made up in Lady Elizabeth's honor, though apparently for the Smythe Smiths, it was one of the few entertainments which Anthony Harford had given since Estelle had ceased to exist for him—how many months ago now!—months that had lengthened into years, if sensation may be the measure of time.

Those of the neighborhood who were invited were glad of this break in the monotony of their country life, and especially glad to go to Anthony Harford's. And more than one mother with a bevy of nice good girls still tacked to her maternal skirts sighed with profound pity as she spoke of poor dear Mr Harford's desolate, and worse than desolate, state. If he did but know the truth, it would be so much better for him! If Mrs. Harford had been killed, or had committed suicide in a fit of mania—she was always a little odd and abstracted, was she not?—why then, you see, he would be free to marry again. And really that poor little boy of his would be so much better off with a lady for his step-mother instead of a mere uneducated hireling as a nurse. And if she had gone off with any one else—but who could it be? No one here, for certain; perhaps some one she had met abroad—then he could get a divorce, and thus also he would be free. In any case it would be so much better if he knew; and he was greatly to be pitied for his miserable state of uncertainty—neither married nor single—not free, yet not bound.

As letters are always like the unknown treasures of Pandora's box in the country, the Smythe Smiths stopped their carriage and took their bag from the postman, Mr. Smythe Smith distributing the contents. To his wife were many of the most profound unimportance, though among them was one which interested her greatly—one from her son, announcing his engagement with Lady Venetia Lackland. To Lady Elizabeth came two only—one from her mother, the other, in an unknown hand, redirected from abroad. Love conquering curiosity, she opened her mother's first, and read there the further news of Estelle's sad life, the death of Charlie, and Caleb Stagg's departure. The other was from Caleb himself, telling her of Estelle's perilous condition, and asking her to come out to the Riviera at once. Here, then, was a fresh turn of the rope, and a new coil for all concerned. It was well for Lady Elizabeth that the Smythe Smiths were so much preoccupied with their own affairs they had no time to study her face. It would have betrayed too much if they had. Not that she had any longer the perplexity of choice which had disturbed her conscience in the first instance. Now that Charlie was dead, and Estelle in need and sorrow, Anthony must know the truth. He could not kill the one, as he would have done had he come up with him; surely he would not harm a hair of the head of the other. In any case, he must be told, and she, Lady Elizabeth, his friend throughout, must tell him. It was one of the most painful moments of her life, but it had to be gone through.

As it chanced, the Upperfold party were the first to arrive at Thrift.

They were sitting about the room—Mr. and Mrs. Smythe Smith full of happy babble undertoned, Lady Elizabeth silent but speculating on what Estelle had cared for most in this stiff and desolate-looking chamber—when Anthony came in. Even more visibly than with Lady Elizabeth he bore the impress of something amiss on his face. His dark eyes were aflame with that fierce yet sombre light of a man's concealed passion. He looked at Lady Elizabeth with a wistfulness as if he wished to speak to her, and found in her face consolation—of a kind.

No private talk was, however, possible to people who knew their proper bearings, and the two whose souls were so heavily laden had to bear their respective fardels for the present unshared.

After the luncheon was over and the guests had risen, a number of them spread themselves over the garden and in among the houses. Anthony and Lady Elizabeth were left together. He had said to her in a low voice, "I want to speak to you," as she passed him at the table, and she had therefore held herself apart. For she, too, wanted to speak to him—to tell him what she knew. Thus the thing was soon arranged, and what people might choose to say of this private meeting did disturb neither of them. He laid his broad hand on her arm and said, for any one to hear who could or cared: "Come with me into my study, Lady Elizabeth. I have something to show you and say to you."

"Yes," she answered. "So have I something to say and show you."

"About the same thing?" he asked.

"I imagine so," she answered.

Strong, athletic, brave as he was, Anthony quivered like a hysterical woman. His forehead and upper lip were wet with those drops which bespeak a man's agony.

"My God! if you did but know what I have heard!" he said, fiercely.

"What ever it is, you will bear it with patience and nobleness," returned Lady Elizabeth, in her soft steadfast way, claiming magnanimity because believing in it.

He grasped her arm as if his fingers had been a vise, and, with the action of a jailer, opened the study door, and, as it were, thrust her in.

"If this is true, I have but one course before me," he said, as he shut the door with a clang, and touched the revolver in his pocket.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE STRUGGLE.

"Read this," said Anthony, thrusting a letter into Lady Elizabeth's hand. "Can it be true? My God! it seems impossible of her—that woman of all! So pure and sweet as she was!"

He turned away to the window. The passion of wrath and grief that held him was almost more than he could bear. He felt as if he must die under it; and he did not wish Lady Elizabeth to see his agony.

The letter, which bore the Kingshouse postmark, was anonymous and written in a feigned hand, though Lady Elizabeth fancied she could detect certain well-known scratchy characters through the disguise. Whoever wrote it was thoroughly up in the later history of the unfortunate fugitives, for the letter gave the whole story clearly and succinctly "up to date," as people say, without a mistake anywhere, save in color. It told of the discovery by Mrs. Medlicott of Estelle and Charlie Osborne on the Riviera; of their passing as man and wife under the name of Mr. and Mrs. Charles; of the young bride's virtuous indignation at the cheat which somehow seemed to lessen the legal sanction of her own estate, and the brave way in which she stripped this false mask from those shameless faces; of the man's death; of Caleb Stagg's subsequent protection of the abandoned female left to poverty and shame. This last scene in the sad drama was laid out on the same lines as the first: and the faithful omadhaun's unselfish care, with Estelle's half-unconscious acceptance, was treated as an act of cynical profligacy on his part and of nameless infamy on hers. This was the false note which gave its worst aspect to the whole affair, and made the first crooked step so unpardonable. One lover was unspeakable abomination for a married woman; but immediately after the death of that one, to pass into the hands of another, to be cared for, supported, "protected" by him—what shame of strange disgrace ever equalled this? And this was the life and deed of Estelle, she, as Anthony had said, of all women the most sweet and pure!

"Can it be true?" asked Anthony, coming back to the table by which Lady Elizabeth was standing, still holding the letter in her hand.

"It is true, and false," she said, in a low voice, but quite distinctly.

"Yes?" said Anthony, as a spur, when she paused.

"Estelle did live with Mr. Osborne, as the letter says," she continued; "but Caleb Stagg is simply her friend—the stop-gap between her and starvation. He is not her lover."

"Not her lover?—only a platonic friend, full of zealous philanthropy and Christian charity?" sneered Anthony.

"Yes," said Lady Elizabeth.

"You speak confidently, my dear lady," he returned, with a bitter laugh; "more confidently than I should dare to do. You are a bold moralist to set the limits of a woman's degradation when she has once begun. I never found those limits yet, and I have seen something of life."

"I know Estelle, and I love her," she said, as gently and as firmly as she had spoken before.

"And I neither know nor love her?" he replied, with the same sneer.

"If you believe her capable of this infamy, neither," she said in answer.

"Then you think a man's love is measured by his lachete!" he said, fiercely, after a pause, coming back to the table and confronting her, much as if she had been the cause and origin of all.

"No, indeed not! indeed not!" she answered; "but by his magnanimity—his ability to understand all the circumstances, and to forgive those which offend himself—yes; that I do think is the measure of a noble man's true love."

"Desertion of husband, home and child—silence for months, leaving the deserted to all the agonies of suspense and ignorance—selfishness added to profligacy—and now the second fatal plunge into a still lower depth of dishonor—all this to be accepted by a husband as a venial offence—a slight departure from the strict lines of duty—to be condoned and forgiven without much difficulty? And then Lady Elizabeth Inchbold would say a man had loved his wife as he should; and that self-respect in repudiation would have been harsh and brutal!"

"I do not say this, Mr. Harford. You are scarcely just to me," she answered.

"Not just to allow that you make guilt int resting, if less than admirable? Do you want me to confess that it is also admirable, and that our prosaic old notions about fidelity and honor and all the rest of it are mere lumber?" said Anthony. "I must be under your tutelage some time longer, Lady Elizabeth, before I can pass in your school."

"If you will discuss this matter with me without anger against me—or her—we may come to a better understanding," answered Lady Elizabeth, with her well-known patience and self-suppression. "If you will not—or cannot—there is no use of my staying here."

"Kleine Sorgen machen zartlich, grosse machen hart und wild," say the Germans. And the saying was true now with Anthony. His whole nature seemed to have become both soured and warped, and for the moment no good impulse was possible—no good influence could touch him. Had an angel from heaven been standing there in Lady Elizabeth's place, he would have been no more soothed, no more amenable to reason, than now. Doubtless it was an unrighteous impulse, but it was sadly human.

"I am quite calm and willing to discuss any subject on any basis you may desire," said Anthony, by way of reply. His calmness, by the way, was shown in his fiery eyes and the sneer on his uplifted lip. "What anger can I have against you? If your ideas of a man's honor differ from mine, that is my misfortune. I object to my wife's passing from me to another man, and from that man to yet another. It does not seem to me quite the right thing for a woman to do. You uphold it in your friend, and blame me that I resent it. We are not agreed, that is all. But why anger?"

For a moment Lady Elizabeth flushed and quivered with pride as much as indignation. To the humblest-minded, the most democratic lady, come those moments of pride when a man's touch is rough and a man's word is rude. Then she remembers the inheritance of her birth, and stands on her superiority. This indignation of pride, however, lasted only a short time with Lady Elizabeth. With an effort she controlled herself, and again thought only of the work in hand.

"You do not put it any the more fairly, Mr. Harford," she said, more coldly than she had spoken before; "for, in the first place, she has not passed into other hands. I tell you again that Mr. Stagg is no more to her than her servant. He is, indeed, to all intents and purposes as much to her as her servant!"

"Who will have to settle accounts with me," said Anthony.

"If in any other way than by your rendering him respect and gratitude, your accounts will go wrong," said Lady Elizabeth.

"And here again we differ," said Anthony, in the same manner as before. "According to your code I have not only to forgive the first lover, but to be grateful to the second. Your sliding scale is peculiar, Lady Elizabeth. It scarcely suits a man who has learned the rougher side of life in such a school as mine has been. We are not taught these subtleties."

"Yes, you have to forgive the dead and be grateful to the living," repeated Lady Elizabeth, ignoring the latter half of his speech. "And you have to be merciful to the dying," she added, tears coming into her eyes.

"When she is dead I will forgive her," said Anthony.

"She may be dead now," said Lady Elizabeth. He turned on her fiercely.

"What do you know about her?" he asked.

"Everything," she answered.

She had Caleb's letter in her hand, that awkward, stiffly worded letter, with the pure soul shining through like the moon through fog and vapor.

"And for how long, pray, have you been the confidante of my runaway wife?" he asked, with dangerous quietness.

"She has not confided in me at all, but I have known for some days now that she was alive; that he was dead, and she perhaps dying only to-day."

Anthony strode across the space which had been between, and took her by the arm, harshly rather than rudely.

"You are my friend?" he said, in a hoarse voice.

"Yes," she answered, "I am."

"And you have known for some days that she was alive—you knowing what a hell my life has been to me since she left me—how I would have kissed the hands and feet of my worst enemy who had told me she was alive—and you kept it from me—you, Lady Elizabeth Inchbold?"

"Yes, I did," she answered.

Her perfect calmness and the steady look in her soft eyes seemed almost to paralyze Anthony. He unclosed his hand from her bruised arm.

"My God! you women are fiends sent to torture us!" he said, wildly. "All alike! The best and the worst faithless and untrustworthy alike!"

"Is it faithless and untrustworthy to keep back a thing like this when the one to whom it would else have been told is as wild and unreasonable as you?" she asked. "With that revolver in your pocket, and all your hot anger; with Mr. Osborne dying, and she, poor girl, in her agony; could I tell you, to add to her misery the greatest pain of all—your sudden appearance, your violence, and who knows what else! Ask yourself, how could I? I am her friend as well as yours, and I would not have her hurt by any deed of mine!"

"How do you know I would have hurt her?" he asked, fiercely. "Am I a brute or a man? Why should I not have been gentle with her?"

"Because you are not always reasonable," she answered. "If I could have trusted you I would have told you. As things were, I dared not."

"A wild beast!" he said, savagely.

"Too much like one at times," she returned, her voice and eyes more gentle than her words.

For the first time during this painful interview the expression on Anthony's passionate face changed. Some of the fierceness died out of it to make way for a human look of blank amazement. It was so strange to him to have this soft and sympathetic woman stand there as his assessor. He had been so used to her sweetness, to the consciousness of her affection and her sympathy, which was like a satin cloak in which he wrapped himself luxuriously, that this sudden change to unwavering condemnation struck him as something strange and unnatural in her rather than as injurious to him. Anyway, it gave a new turn to his thoughts, and swept back some of that rolling flood of anger against others.

"You are not the Lady Elizabeth I knew at Kingshouse," he said.

"Nor are you the Mr. Harford I thought I knew," she retorted.

"No! This is really interesting," he sneered. "Where is the change? In what am I different?"

"In nobility of nature," she answered. "The man I thought I knew three or four years ago at Kingshouse was brave and unselfish, magnanimous, gentle to weakness, courteous to women, reasonable, high-minded. The Mr. Harford I find here at Thrift is unreasonable, unforgiving, able to see a thing from his own point of view only, unable to judge beyond the mere fact, revengeful and cruel. I am right to say that he has changed—at least from my ideal."

"Oh, I never posed for an ideal," said Anthony, contemptuously.

"Perhaps not; but this does not say that you were not a better man than you are now. You have been tried since then, and you have not stood the test."

"Which brings us round to our starting-point," he said. "You advocate the baseness of condonation, I the self-respect of a man of honor who refuses to shake hands with sin, or to lower himself by sympathy to such a depth of degradation as that to which your friends have sunk themselves."

"No; you mean you refuse to forgive a woman who has sinned much, and suffered as much as she has sinned, and who has paid the full penalty of her fault—the woman you say you love. Greater men than you, Mr. Harford, have forgiven even worse offences, and the Master forgave more than all. It is neither brave nor strong to stand out as you are doing for the sake of yourself against her—your honor, as you call it, against her suffering. I will not call it good, for I do not think it is."

"I am sorry I cannot please Lady Elizabeth," said Anthony, still contemptuously, but with less intensity of insolence and wrath.

"It is not whether you please me or not; it is whether you do right or wrong," she answered, very gently.

"Frankly what would you have me do?" He spoke with the air of a man lowering his sword, but still on guard.

"Forgive her," she answered—"forgive her frankly, fully, heartily. Remember that she loved Charlie Osborne long before she knew you. Remember, too, that false announcement of his death, which you knew on your wedding day to be false. If she has left you, think how you and her mother deceived her. Cannot you bring all this to bear for her pardon? Divorce her if you will; but why? She is not herself; her mind is evidently unhinged." Here her soft voice broke, and her eyes up-filled with tears. "Let her be in peace, Mr. Harford. Fate has already avenged you."

"And you knew she did not love me? And you did not tell me this either? Oh, false, false, like all the rest!" he said bitterly, passionately.

"How could I?" she answered. "You knew it in your heart yourself, but you would not acknowledge it. If all the world had told you, you would have married her just the same."

"God help me! I would, for I loved her," he said, covering his face in his hands.

"And because you loved her, forgive her," she pleaded. "Think of her sufferings rather than her sin. By all that you have felt, feel for her. Tell me that you will forgive her."

Anthony did not speak. His whole strong frame was quivering, and one heavy tear broke through the interlacing of his fingers.

Weeping with less restraint, and all her tears in her voice, Lady Elizabeth went up to him, and with a woman's true instinct, laid her hands on his shoulders.

"I am going to her to-morrow," she said, her broken voice having in it the accent of a caress, like a pearl on a quivering golden string. "Let me carry her your forgiveness; let me tell her that you pardon and pity her! Tell me that you do, Mr. Harford—Anthony—the man I once thought so noble, and who was so noble!"

For a moment there was no reply. The silence in the room was broken only by a few half-strangled sobs—groans rather than sobs—while Lady Elizabeth's slender hands rested on those massive heaving shoulders with a touch as tender as an angel's. She looked like the typical angel as she stood there, her fair face pale with emotion, her eyes full of pleading love and pity, her body slightly thrown forward, her whole attitude and bearing as instinct with dignity as with pathos, as pure as it was tender—she, the friend, pleading for pardon of the wife with the man she herself loved. A strange revulsion of feeling took possession of Anthony. He suddenly forgot himself, and his thoughts went only to Estelle's sufferings. He pictured her ill, in want, dying—that woman he had loved so madly needing help, and he not there to give what he was so grandly able to give! Perhaps the gentle touch of those white hands on his shoulders, the soft breath that just swept over his hair as if from a feather fan, a subtle perception not so strong as a thought, that the world held another woman beside Estelle—perhaps all this helped to soften him and to quench the fires of his wrath. Whatever it was, he was overcome, and his mood changed suddenly. He uncovered his disordered face, thrust his right hand into his pocket, took out the revolver, and laid it on the table.

"You have conquered," he said. "I forgive her. Shall I give this to you?"—again taking up the revolver—"or can you trust me?

"I will trust you," she answered, scarce able to speak. "You will not break your word."

He took her hands from his shoulders and held them in one of his; the other he put round her waist and pressed her to him How long it was since he had held a woman in his arms! How the touch of that supple, slender form seemed to give him new life, to subdue him to the strong man's tenderness, conquered in his strength and brought back to his better self! At the first he did not speak, nor did she try to free herself. Both were too moved to remember what significance that embrace might have—he with her hands held up to his breast, his arm round her waist, and she with her face turned away and her eyes fixed on the sky seen through the window. At last Anthony spoke.

A Song.

Is any one sad in the world I wonder?
Does any one weep on a day like this?
With the sun above and the green earth under,
Why, what is life but a dream of bliss?

With the sun, and the skies, and the birds above me,
Birds that sing as they wheel and fly—
With the winds that follow and say they love me—
Who could be lonely? O ho, not I.

Somebody said in the street this morning,
As I opened my window to let in the light,
That the darkest day of the world was dawning,
But I locked, and the east was a gorgeous sight.

One who claims that he knows about it
Tells me the earth is a vale of sin;
But I and the bees, and the birds we doubt it,
And I think it a world worth living in.

Some one says that hearts are fickle,
That love is sorrow and life is care,
And the reaper, Death, with his shining sickle,
Gathers whatever is bright and fair.

I told the thrush and we laughed together,
Laughed till the woods were all a-ring;
And he said to me, as he plumed each feather,
"Well, people must croak if they cannot sing."

Up he flew, but his song, remaining,
Hung like a bell in my heart all day,
And silenced the voices of weak complaining,
That pipe like insects along the way.

Oh world of light! Oh world of beauty!
Where are the pleasures so sweet as thine?
Yes; life is love, and love is duty;
And what heart sorrows? Oh no, not mine!

TO SLEEP IN A COFFIN.

Scores of Young Men Respond to an Undertaker's Advertisement.

YOUNG MAN TO SLEEP AND MAKE himself useful in undertaker office; wages $5. Call at 1,259 Broadway.

The above interesting invitation appeared in the Herald yesterday morning, and strange as it may appear the undertaker was besieged with applicants desirous of sleeping in a pine box and answering the night bell of the undertaker's establishment. I saw the proprietor of the funeral office, and he told me that he had almost lost his patience, so numerous were the young men who were willing to rest their weary limbs amid such ghostly surroundings. "You see," he said, "there are a great number of young Englishmen—grooms, valets and what not—who come over here and have no place to sleep at night, and when they see an advertisement like mine, that offers them shelter and beer money, why, they jump at it. They may say 'ugh' outside, and swear they wouldn't sleep in a coffin, but they find it away ahead of a bench in the Park.—New York Herald.

He Cometh Not, she Said.

She is waiting in the darkness, she is waiting by the door, and she hears the sad sea moaning as it beats the sandy shore; and she hears the night-bird crying, and the wailing of the trees, and upon her fevered forehead gently blows the southern breeze; but in vain she stands and listens for the coming of the one who to her is prince and hero, who is brighter than the sun. Close the door, O weeping lady, close the door and weep alone, to the sighing of the branches to the ocean's sullen moan; to the screaming of the night bird, to the sobbing of the rain, as it falls like tears from heaven, pushing on the window pane. Let your eyes this night be rivers and your hair a mourning veil, let your soul float out to heaven in a wild despairing wail; for the footsteps of your hero do not echo on the shore, and to-night you'll never see him though you're waiting by the door; and you will not hear the music of the voice you love so well, you will only hear the moaning of the ocean's restless swell. Close the door, O weeping lady, look no more for him you love, better look for hope and comfort to the sombre sky above; to your side your love and hero all your watching cannot win, for he tried to paint the city and the peelers ran him in.—Nebraska State Journal.

Friends of the Farmer

It may be an advantage to point out some of the friends of the farmer, which, consequently, no farmer should destroy or allow to be destroyed. Among these are toads, which are, under all circumstances, the farmer's friend; moles and field mice, probably, do a vast deal more of good than harm; all birds, especially robins, wrens, thrushes, orioles, cuckoos, phebes, blue birds, woodpeckers, swallows and cat birds. The destruction of all these and many others, except for scientific purposes, should be made, under very heavy penalties, illegal in every State. The house sparrow, known better as the English sparrow, is to be rated an exception. This bird is now universally regarded as a nuisance, first, because of its grain and vegetable destroying propensities; secondly, because it drives away insect destroying birds. Among insects, many wasps are friends, especially those with a more or less protruding horn or sting at the end of the abdomen. Lady-bugs and lace-wing flies live entirely upon destructive insects, especially plant lice and scale insects, and should never be destroyed. Dragon flies, or devil's darning-needles, are also useful as well as harmless.—Bulletin 46, New Jersey, A. C. E. S.

Northwest Rivers Dry Up.

The Saskatchewan is nearly run out and has hardly enough water to merit the name of a river. Sandbars everywhere meet the eye and cover a greater area of the bed of the river than does the water. At Pitt the channel is only a few rods wide. In the South Branch it is so low that it is found impossible to operate the ferry at Saskatoon, and fording the river has to be resorted to. Rafts are beached all along the river, and movements in the lumber interests are impossible. Battle River is also very low.—Battleford Herald.

And yet they call it a "protective" policy which produces such results as these!

THE movement to erect a memorial at Kirkcaldy, Fifeshire, Scotland, in honor of Adam Smith, author of the "Wealth of Nations," a native of the town, is taking practical shape. A preliminary meeting of Magistrates and others, presided over by Provost Beveridge, has come to a strong opinion in favor of the movement. The idea is to build a large memorial hall, with accommodation for a free library, etc., at a cost of about £50,000. The meeting was most unanimous in the matter, and a committee was appointed to draw up a report, to be submitted to a public meeting of the inhabitants to be held at an early day, when arrangements having in view the raising of the fund will be discussed, and also probable sites for the proposed building.

THE Duke of Hamilton's decision to let Arran has caused much excitement in the Firth of Clyde district, as it is regarded, says a London newspaper, as only a preliminary step to selling the island. The shootings extend to 70,000 acres, and the estimated bag is 5,000 brace of grouse, 50 stags and 30 hinds, while in winter the island affords some of the best woodcock shooting in great Britain. The rent asked for the whole is £7,000 a season. The whole of Arran belongs to the Duke, except the estates of Kilmichael and Whitefarland, which are the property of the Misses Fullarton, whose family have been settled on the island since 1307, and the shooting over the estates is leased by the Duke of Hamilton. The Arran scenery, both on the coast and among the hills, is magnificent.

THE simplest way to moderate the glare of the light of incandescent lamps without losing too much of its lighting power is according to the Electrische Anzeiger, to give the globes a thin coating of collodion. With a little practice the uniform distribution of the collodion coating over the whole surface is soon achieved. Besides simplicity and cheapness this method presents the additional advantage that the coat is easy to remove with water. In connection with this communication the Polytechnische Notizblatt recommends to paint the lamps over with a solution of a salt, whereby they are covered by a coat of fine crystals. These innumerable crystals affect a diffusion of the light without materially diminishing its intensity. Salts of lead and tin are thought to be the most suitable for this purpose, but other materials may be found more convenient.

LAST week there was a great stir in the English religious world. Mr. Spurgeon opened with a vigorous attack upon Rev. Dr. Clifford, President of the Baptist Union, for attending service in South Place Chapel, Moncure Conway's old headquarters, now chiefly used by Comptеists and secularists. Mr. Spurgeon wonders how a man professing to be a servant of Christ could associate himself with such a place. Clifford has been nursing his wrath and on Sunday, from his own pulpit, delivered a reply. The other matter, according to a cablegram, is a personal quarrel between Rev. Charles Berry, who was offered the pastorate of the Brooklyn Chapel, and Rev. Dr. Parker, the famous Congregational preacher. Berry's offence lay in appearing on a political platform with Mr. Bradlaugh, the Radical atheist and member for Northampton. Mr Berry defended himself with much vigor, and wound up by remarking that Parker is a man who makes emphasis do duty for originality—a statement which those who heard the rev. doctor preach in America will be able to appreciate. Dr. Parker has just made a somewhat incoherent reply to what he terms an unwarrantable and contemptible attack, and he also will have more to say on the subject next Sunday from the pulpit, into which it is now fashionable on that side to drag personalities and other extraneous matter. So far as the quadruple fight has gone, Spurgeon and Berry have had decidedly the better of it.

STAINS ON BRICKS.

The Ugly White Coating Can be Prevented

"Many a noble building is half ruined almost as soon as completed," said a contractor yesterday, "and many another will go on suffering this same process for a long time to come. Early in their career quantities of brick structures become coated with a white frosty covering by some mysterious process, and once stained their beauty is lost forever. Stone buildings enjoy no immunity from this unsightly coating, and a number of the finest brown stone edifices in New England have been by their means robbed of a portion of their grace. The most noticeable stains are generally upon walls that have a northern or eastern exposure and are most subjected to rain storms. They become soaked with moisture, and the white coating forms upon their surface while they are drying off. About the chimneys, along the lines of leaky water spouts and upon the bricks that form or lie near the payment the stains are apt to be especially prevalent, as in such spots the dampness dries most rapidly, and thus the ugliness of the coating is hastened and accentuated. The efflorescence is derived from both the brick and the mortar, and is a combination of sulphates of lime and magnesia, which is formed during the process of burning. If proper precautions were observed in the erection of prominently exposed buildings these effects might be minimized. For instance, lime that is absolutely devoid of magnesia should be used for mortar, and in the manufacture of bricks wood should be the fuel, as the sulphurous vapor arising from a coal fire is sure to mingle to some extent with the burnt clay. With these ingredients, sulphur and magnesia, removed there can be little danger of disfigured walls. Yet it will be many a day before builders will come to learn this. They would rather manufacture their materials in the present slipshod fashion, and let the owner take his chances as to subsequent disfigurement by wind and weather."

Mind-Reader Bishop's Peculiarities.

Washington Irving Bishop, who died the other day, seemed always to belong to the darkness and the night. It was very unusual to see him about in the day time. At the Gedney House, where he stopped before his last trip to California, he usually occupied his room until 4 or 5 o'clock in the afternoon, when he got up and took breakfast. Then he was to be found around town all the evening and until 4 or 5 or even 6 o'clock the next morning. It was the most common thing in the world to go in to any of the cafes along Broadway at 3 o'clock and find Bishop the centre of an admiring crowd, which he had been entertaining for perhaps an hour or two previously. When he got into the exhilarated condition resulting from frequent potations he was in the habit of making the most extraordinary statements concerning himself. I remember him one night in Milligan's announcing as an important secret that Sadie Martinot was his sister. However this may be, it is true that T. Brigham Bishop, the talented basket-shop man and the composer of "Pretty as a Picture," is his brother, and in some respects quite as remarkable a human being as the late mind reader.—New York World.

Decorations at Balmoral.

A variety of alterations and improvements are to be carried out at Balmoral during the next two months. It has been decided that a number of the jubilee presents are to be sent to Balmoral, and they will be arranged in the drawing-room and library, and in the entrance hall and corridor which are now pretty well filled with statues and busts of various members of the Royal family, including Theed's white marble statue of the Prince Consort, who is represented in Highland dress, and of this work a gigantic replica, in bronze, is a prominent object in the grounds. The sitting rooms at Balmoral are principally decorated and furnished in Stuart tartan, of which the Queen is very fond, and the walls are adorned with the heads of stags and other sporting trophies, and hung with engravings and photographs representing Highland scenes, and a few portraits, but there are very few pictures, and none of any merit, as Her Majesty's large collection of, those which are her own private property) is divided between Osborne and the private apartments at Windsor, except a few pictures which are kept at Buckingham Palace.—London Truth.

Why He Flirted.

An Atchison man whose wife was quite fat was caught flirting, and he made a rather novel explanation of his conduct. "The great ambition of your life," he said to his wife, after being caught at it, "was to become slender. Knowing that there was no efficacy in the stuff known as Anti-Fat, I resolved to flirt away your superfluous flesh. It wrung my heart to do it, but I was willing to make any sacrifice for your happiness. So I flirted, and you began to lose flesh. You are now as spirituelle as you ever wished to be. Come to my arms, and say you never doubted me."—Atchison Globe.

He kept his word, and died immediately after giving the sign.—Los Angeles despatch.

WOMEN MAKING UP.

Their Doing So Pleases the Men—All Nonsense to say They should Not Do So.

It is all nonsense to tell women not to "make up," says the Philadelphia Inquirer. They will do it, and we must confess that some are positively repulsive mostly because they endeavor to do away entirely with all the dainty accessories so necessary to a charming and attractive toilette. The trouble is that so many silly women, in their anxiety for self-improvement, overreach the mark which divides refined elegance from grotesque vulgarity. The fault lies not so much in the use of some one or more articles to improve defects, but the way in which they are used. Ah! the men are so fearfully inconsistent. That is the trouble. How often they are heard to declare, in terms most emphatic, that woman's greatest charm is in being perfectly natural. Now watch them, please, when introduced to a fascinating bit of femininity. Do they stop to study up causes and effects to find just what has given that delicate tinge of color to the pretty white cheek, to inquire why the eyes look so dark and brilliant as they dance and sparkle beneath the curly, fluffy bang? Of course not. The inconsistent creature, man, realizes but one thing. The girl is lovely, and he who is so ready to condemn is also the first to admire. The cute little woman laughs in her sleeve and goes on her way rejoicing, feeling quite repaid for the extra attention given to her skilful and artistic make up.

Latest Fashion Gossip.

A Paris despatch says that on Saturday Buffalo Bill gave a reception at his show, at which 15,000 attended. The ladies blossomed out in exhibition style. The chief attraction, of course, was Madame Carnot, in a grey faille with embroidered side-panels as ornaments. A shoulder cape of black lace reached to the waist, elaborately covered with garlands of black jet. A small black lace bonnet was trimmed with scarlet poppies.

Miss Marie VanZandt's gown was noticeable for its simplicity. It was made of Princesse, of black point-de-soie, with a front of black thread lace.

A Distinction With a Difference.

It was at a fancy dress ball that a very handsome woman approached the usher to be announced. As the usher laid his hand on the door he asked: "What name shall I announce?" "Oh," was the response, "a lady in dress of the period of Queen Anne; no particular character." The usher flung wide the door and in stentorian tones announced: "A lady in a dress of the period of Queen Anne—without any character.

Milk for Cheese Factories.

BY JAS. W ROBERTSON, PROFESSOR OF DAIRYING

Concluded from last week.

COOLING.—The subsequent cooling of milk retards the process by which it is turned sour. Certain germs of fermentation exist in milk which in the act of multiplication split one molecule of sugar-of-milk into four molecules of lactic acid. By delaying the operation of these germs the milk is kept sweet for a longer period. The cooling of the milk should never precede the aeration. A temperature of from 65° to 70° Fahr. will be found cold enough for the keeping of milk over night, when it has been previously aired.

PROTECTION.—Milk is a liquid of absorbent proclivities. It should be protected against injury that would result from exposure to impure air. A general purpose milk-stand is a device specially adapted for the spoiling of milk in that way. Such a stand serves as a milk-stand and also a carriage stand, both of which are legitimate uses. Sometimes it is also used as a hog bivouac for the convenience of these animals, the end of whose whey trough furnishes one step of the stand. Both of these latter extensions of its uses and hospitalities are all wrong.

MATTERS MOST NEEDFUL OF CARE.—In the following short paragraphs I have ventured to gather helpful advice on the matters most needful of care.

1. Milk from cows in excellent health and apparent contentment only should be used.

2. Until after the eighth milking, the milk should not be offered to a cheese factory.

3. An abundant supply of suitable, succulent, easily digestible, wholesome nutritious feed should be provided

4. Pure cold water should be allowed in quantities limited only by the cow's capacity and desire to drink.

5. A box or trough containing salt to which the cows have access every day is a requisite indispensible in the profitable keeping of cows.

6. Stagnant impure water should be prohibited. The responsibility for the efficacy for that beneficial prohibition rests wholly with the individual farmer.

7. Wild leeks and other weeds common in bush pastures give an offensive odor and flavor to the milk of animals consuming them.

8 All vessels used in the handling of milk should be thoroughly cleansed immediately after their use. Washing first in tepid cold water to which has been added a little soda and subsequent scalding with boiling water, will prepare them for airing, that they may remain perfectly sweet.

9 Cows should be milked with dry hands and only after the udders have been washed or thoroughly rubbed.

10. Tin pails only should be used

11 All milk should be properly strained immediately after it is drawn

12 Milking should be done and milk should be kept only in a place where the surrounding air is pure Otherwise the presence of the tainting odors will not be neglected by the milk

13 All milk should be thoroughly aired immediately after it has been strained The treatment is equally beneficial to the evening's and the morning's milk

14. In warm weather all milk should be cooled to the temperature of the atmosphere after it has been aired, but not before.

15. Milk is the better for being kept over night in small quantities, rather than in a large quantity in one vessel.

16 Milk stands should be constructed to shade the cans or vessels containing milk from the sun, as well as to shelter them from rains.

17 Only pure, clear, honest milk should be offered. Any deviation from that will not always go unpunished.

Kimberley.

From our own Correspondent.

We are sorry to hear of the illness of Mrs. Gilbert of this place. The trouble is thought to be a cancer in the stomach. We hope she may get well again.

Quite a number of people visited our beautiful little village on the Queen's birthday. Fishermen came from all parts and took away a goodly number of the speckled beauties.

Base ball and boating was the order of the afternoon. An amalgated team from Duncan and Rome played a friendly game with Kimberley. As the afternoon was wet seven innings each were all that were played. There was very little excitement, as the almalgated team was not to be compared with our boys. At the end of the sixth innings for Kimberley and the seventh for the almalgated team the score stood, Kimberley forty-five, Rome 6. A return match is not expected. R. D. Carruthers was the umpire chosen by the visiting team.

Boating on the pond was the order of the evening Mr. Graham and Mr. F. Thurston gave their boats free, and the young people enjoyed themselves very much. Three or four loads from Collingwood came to see our beautiful village. Everything passed off quietly. Not an angry word was heard, and every one, we think, went home feeling well satisfied that Kimberley was one of the nicest places to spend a few hours in they had seen.

On Monday last a serious accident happened on the third line of Euphrasia. While raising a barn of Mr Thos Foster, Mr. D. Wallace of this place, while standing on the beam, slipped and fell to the ground a distance of about 27 feet. He was picked up for dead. Dr. McBride was summoned, and when he arrived he found Mr. Wallace's left arm broken. The injured man was brought home the next day and is now doing well. He will soon be around again.

ORANGE V. JESUIT.

At the Orange Grand Lodge, held in Goderich last week, the Jesuit Bill was of course the great thing to chant over. From reports of the convention, given by the daily papers (which, by the way, are somewhat conflicting) it would appear that the Orange body are not at all united when it comes down to a straight matter of politics. Upon one point they are united, and that is that the present is a peculiarly fitting time to press for incorporation, and have accordingly given their Executive instructions to take steps to have an Act of Incorporation submitted at the next meeting of Parliament. Thus is the Orange body tied down to await next meeting of Parliament. They must not prance too much in the meantime. Coupled with this the Grand Lodge placed one thousand dollars in the hands of the Executive to be spent in testing the legality of the offensive act before the Judical Committee of the Privy Council, and urged the Orange organizations and individual Orangemen to subscribe towards this fund. The special committee's report as adopted is very carefully worded, but expresses strong disapproval of the course pursued by Protestant members of Parliament. This is the section as adopted:

"That we record [illegible] approval of the course pursued [illegible] our Most Worshipful Grand Master and those who [illegible] with [illegible] in supporting the [illegible] Lieut.-Col. O'Brien, M.P., in the House of Commons, relating to the disallowance of the Jesuits' Estate Act, and our strong disapproval of the action of the Protestant members of Parliament who voted against these resolutions."

The seventh paragraph reads:

"Believing this to be a fitting time to urge the incorporation of the Orange order, your committee recommends that the Executive of this Grand Lodge be instructed to take the proper steps to have an Act of incorporation submitted to the Parliament of Canada at its next session."

We suppose the course adopted by the Grand Lodge was the most politic for themselves, but the above quotations when placed side by side tend to engender a suspicion that efforts in the former will be over-shadowed by exertions towards the latter end.

THE JESUIT AGITATION.

There is a heavy storm brewing, gentlemen. Ignoring the fact is a poor policy. Its rumblings are becoming louder every day, and more pronounced. Since the sanction of the Jesuit Bill at Ottawa last winter the cloud has been slowly growing, until at last its shadow covers at least the whole of Ontario. The question has been quietly and calmly discussed by Protestants generally, and a firm opinion has been established and a decision arrived at which is [illegible] fully unanimous, so far as we are able to judge by the dailies and by evidences surrounding us in this portion of the Province. What is that opinion? It is that the Government made a mistake—an egregious mistake—in shelving the matter as they did, leaving it upon the individual to prove legality. It is, also, that the Reform party lost a golden opportunity to retrieve a lost prestige which is now hopelessly gone. It is an extremely critical matter for both of the old parties and will [illegible] such a volcanic eruption upon the present members at next election as has not been seen in Canada for many years. Dr. Sproul has been challenged by Rev. Mr. McLaren to discuss the question publicly, but we understand that it is not his intention to accept. It is pretty safe to say that Dr. Landerkin will not receive the Reform nomination in South Grey, and if he does the result will be disastrous to him. The Advance hazards the opinion that new men should be brought out—men who will not sell their country for the sake of party, although strong party men—and by this means establish a precedent whereby all representatives of this people may hereafter forever govern themselves. By such means only can the Government hold its own, and the Opposition retain its present strength.

A Farmer Killed

Terribly Crushed by Falling from a Load of Hay

NEWMARKET, May 30.—A sad accident occurred here this afternoon, resulting in the death of Mr. Alvenus Weber, a farmer living about one mile out of this place. [illegible] for a small load of hay with his twelve-year-old boy. When returning with his hay his team became unmanageable, causing them to run, throwing him and his boy off the load just opposite Dr. Brown's office. He fell forward off the load, and from all appearances both wheels must have passed over him. All his ribs were crushed off the backbone. He was carried into the Dr.'s office immediately after he fell, where he died in a minute or two, leaving no time for medical assistance. Mr. Weber is a highly respected farmer. He has been a resident here for upwards of twenty-five years. Strange to say, the boy also fell, but not in the least hurt. Mr. Weber's family have the sympathy of the entire community.

An Old Sweetheart of Mine.

As one who cons at evening o'er an album all alone,
And muses on the faces of friends that he has known,
So I turn the leaves of fancy till in shadowy design
I find the smiling features of an old sweetheart of mine.

The lamplight seems to glimmer with a flicker of surprise
As I turn it low to rest me of the dazzle in my eyes,
And I light my pipe in silence, save a sigh that seems to yoke
Its fate with my tobacco, and to vanish in the smoke.

'Tis a fragrant retrospection, for the loving thoughts that start
Into being are like perfumes from the blossoms of the heart;
And to dream the old dream over is a luxury
divine,
When my truant fancy wanders with that old
sweetheart of mine.

Though I hear, beneath my study, like a fluttering of wings,
The voices of my children and the mother as she sings,
I feel no twinge of conscience to deny me any theme
When care has cast her anchor in the harbor of a dream.

In fact, to speak in earnest, I believe it adds a charm
To spice the good a trifle with a little dust of harm;
For I find an extra flavor in memory's mellow wine
That makes me drink the deeper to that old
sweetheart of mine.

face of lily beauty and a form of airy grace Float out from my tobacco as the genius from the vase;
And I thrill beneath the glances of a pair of azure eyes
As glowing as the summer and as tender as the skies.

I see the pink sunbonnet and the little checkered dress
She wore when first I kissed her and she answered the caress
With the unwritten declaration that "as surely as the vine
Grew round the stump, she loved me," that old sweetheart of mine.

And again I feel the pressure of her slender little hand,
As we used to talk together of the future we had planned;
When I should be a poet, and with nothing else to do
But to write the tender verses that she set the music to.

When we should live together in a cosy little cot,
Hid in a nest of roses, with a tiny garden spot,
Where the vines were ever fruitful and the weather ever fine,
And the birds were ever singing for that old
sweetheart of mine.

When I should be her lover forever and a day,
And she my faithful sweetheart till the golden hair was gray:
And we should be so happy that when either's lips were dumb
They should not smile in Heaven till the other's kiss had come.

But, ah! my dream is broken by a step upon the stair,
And the door is softly opened, and my wife is standing there.
Yet with eagerness and rapture all my visions I resign
To meet the living presence of that old sweetheart of mine.

ESTELLE'S INFATUATION:

A NOVEL.

"You Delight!" he said, softly. "More angel than woman! what have you done to me? Have you come to redeem me, or to make me despicable in my own eyes?"

"I have come to help her and to prevent a mistake," she replied, her voice faltering.

She made a movement to free herself, but he held her still pressed to him. The voices of the Smythe Smiths, dominating the others, came in from the garden. The guests were returning from the orchids and the vineries.

"We must go back to them," said Lady Elizabeth, whose embarrassment was becoming painful. Woman-like, she was the first to remember appearances and to think of details.

"Yes," said Anthony, with sudden coldness, releasing her and turning away. "This world has to be considered. They must not remember that—" He paused; he was going to add—"that I am married and you are not my wife," but stopped himself in time. There was a suggestiveness in it that would perhaps offend her; and harsh and even brutal as he had been only so short a time ago, he would not now wound her for the wealth of the world or for the whole glory of life.

"Then good-by," said Lady Elizabeth. "I shall leave Uplands to-morrow morning, and shall not see you again."

"We shall meet," he answered, opening the door for her to pass out; but he himself went back into the room, and the restraint of her presence now taken away, he sat down by the table and sobbed like a woman or a child. And his guests, who found Lady Elizabeth sitting alone in the drawing-room, had to leave without formal adieux to their host, whom they amused themselves in vilifying for most part of the way to their respective homes. "Such a boor!" the women said, or "Such a bear!" But the men said, more fiercely, "What a cad that fellow is!"

CHAPTER IX.

TOO PURE TO FEAR.

Even the Smythe Smiths followed suit, and fell foul of their neglectful host with more acrimony than was usual to them. In general they were good-natured enough, as folks are who have anything still to get from the world, and who prefer to coax rather than to compel. But now that their son was about to make a marriage which would ally them with the real aristocracy—albeit with its elbows cooling in the air—they were disposed to stand a little more firmly on their rights, and to resent the slackness of any rope that should be taut.

"It was most discourteous—most unusual!" said Mrs. Smythe Smith, severely. "I wonder where he went—what became of him? Where were you, Lady Elizabeth? I missed you when we went to see the orchids."

"I saw him for a short time after then," said Lady Elizabeth, angel as she was, fibbing a little by implication—by the suggestio falsi as well as the suppressio veri. "He went into the library when I left him, and I heard him look the door."

"Good heavens! is the man mad!" said Mrs. Smythe Smith, irritably. "He is really very ill-bred. I assure you I feel quite insulted, it was so abominably rude."

She was seriously annoyed. To be sure, she had no daughter for whom to find a likely husband; but she none the less desired the friendship, intimate and familiar, of Mr. Harford, and had rather counted on showing off to-day before the rest the good terms on which they, the new-comers at Uplands, stood with the old house of Thrift.

"He was in great trouble," said Lady Elizabeth.

"He has had news of his poor wife; so have I," she continued.

"Good gracious me!" cried Mrs. Symthe Smith, startled into the vernacular of her youth. "Where is she, my dear? What has he heard? Why has she kept him so long in doubt whether she was alive or dead? My! what an extraordinary thing! Wherever can she be? And what on earth has she done?"

"She is ill," said Lady Elizabeth.

"But where?" asked Mrs. Smythe Smith.

"At Mentone," said Lady Elizabeth, with a reluctance she tried to conceal and did not.

"Then she did run away with some one!" cried the other. "And it was her old lover, that young Osborne, of whom I thought better things!"

Shrewd woman as she was, she could put her two and two together as accurately as most.

Lady Elizabeth was silent. Her love and pity for Estelle went as far as silence, but not so far as falsehood.

"Is it not so, Lady Elizabeth? Did she not go off with Mr. Osborne?" repeated the young artist's former hostess and quasi-maternal friend.

"What I know I must not repeat," said Lady Elizabeth, very gently. "My friend's secrets are not mine."

"But I am going to-morrow to Mentone to see her," added Lady Elizabeth. "She was always one of my dearest friends, and I cannot bear to think of her out there alone, without one belonging to her near her."

"Is she alone?" asked Mr. Smythe Smith.

"Yes; one friend only is with her."

"Mr. Osborne?" Mrs. Smythe Smith's curiosity was irrepressible.

"No," said Lady Elizabeth. "He is dead."

Husband and wife looked at each other. This admission was a little rent in the veil of mystery in which the whole affair was shrouded.

"And she is following?" asked Mrs. Smythe Smith.

"She is ill," said Lady Elizabeth, making a fine distinction not lost on her hearers.

"How very sad!" said Mrs. Smythe Smith, with genuine sympathy, not stopping to consider that fracture of the wedding-ring which was all too certain, and thinking only of the suffering human being.

"Yes," said Lady Elizabeth, whose eyes were, as so often before to-day, filling up with tears.

"And you are going, my dear?" asked Mrs. Smythe Smith, a faint little accent of surprise, that might mean almost displeasure, in her voice.

"To-morrow," was the answer.

"How will your people like that? Will your mother and Lord Kingshouse approve of it?"

"Surely," said the earl's daughter, emphatically; "they know how much I loved poor Estelle. They will think me quite right in going to see her now, in her time of trouble."

"But if she went off with that young man?" asked Mrs. Smythe Smith.

"That does not make her sufferings less painful nor his death less pitiable," said Lady Elizabeth.

"No, not for herself; but for you? Those who touch pitch, you know; and Lady Elizabeth is too pure to be defiled."

"If I am good for anything at all, I need not fear defilement!" she answered, quickly. "And defilement from Estelle! Dear friend! you do not know her as I do. She is the purest of the pure—the sweetest and best of all the girls I have ever known."

"And left her husband and gone off with another man?" said Mrs. Smythe Smith her eyebrows uplifted.

"Whatever she may have done she cannot be corrupted," said Lady Elizabeth warmly. "Mistaken, yes; but not corrupted."

"It does not do to palter with sin or to give soft words to wickedness," said Mrs. Smythe Smith, gravely. Between her desire not to offend Lady Elizabeth, and that curiously strict propriety belonging to the socially insecure, she was in a cleft stick; but on the whole she inclined to propriety as the more lasting condition and the more stable foundation.

"If you knew her as well as I do you would think as I do," said Lady Elizabeth. "It would be impossible for Estelle Clanricarde to be evil in heart."

"Only in deed?" queried Mr. Smythe Smith, making a neat point.

"I do not defend all she has done, but corrupt in heart she certainly is not," answered Lady Elizabeth. "I know her so well! I have known her ever since we were quite children together, and she cannot have suddenly changed her nature."

"Still, I do not think I would go to her under all circumstances, if I were you, until you had your parents' sanction," said Mrs. Smythe Smith, sensibly enough.

"I know they would not object," she answered.

"Then, my dear young lady, let me advise you, wait till you are confirmed in your assurance," said her host, in his heart enjoying the new attitude he had suddenly assumed of half-censuring mentor to the earl's daughter, his social superior.

"Perhaps it would be best," she said, sweetly.

"Without question," was the rejoinder. "Do nothing rash, and then you will have nothing to repent. Your actions, remember, Lady Elizabeth, while you are unmarried, belong to your family your control. Your credit and your name are theirs, not your own. Wait, and let my lord decide."

"I can telegraph to-night, but I am sure of their consent," she said.

"In which case you can start, as you propose, to-morrow, with a clean way bill," he answered, with a strange smile.

But Lady Elizabeth was right. My lord's curt answer was simple and direct. "Do as you wish," it said—dictated partly by real kindness toward this desolated, misguided young creature—this Estelle, whom they had known in the days of her innocence, and loved in the heyday of her beauty—and partly by the innate pride of the British nobleman, holding himself and his too high for any kind of danger by contact with any kind of inferior. Had Estelle been one of themselves he might have hesitated; being George Clanricarde's child, his dear Delight might throw over her the mantle of charity, and her snow-white purity would get never a stain in consequence.

So that little hitch was overcome. And Lady Elizabeth made ready to start to-morrow for the Riviera, where she was to take the comfort of her presence to that poor faithful heart half distraught with its self-imposed charge—the soothing of her speech to that guilty soul, beaten down to worse than death by woe, yet too full of her life-long love to have the sense of either repentance or contrition.

And now, on the journey, Lady Elizabeth had leisure to think. For the last twenty-four hours all had been excitement and turmoil and a confusion of feelings in which desire to help Estelle had been the only clear and simple line. She knew that she loved and admired, and, in spite of his late defection from the nobler way, respected Anthony Harford. She did not quite know how passionately she loved him. Girls do not understand themselves as do women of experience when the well-known fires are rekindled, and the familiar eyes of re-awakened love shine out afresh and that which has been is again, under other forms and different names. Still, she felt that she bore something in her heart she neither wished to look at too closely nor to let others see at all. She was conscious of a sense of blessedness in feeling that she could serve him, influence him to good, be of living use to him in any way. She was remembered how he had held her in his arms and she had felt the beating of his heart against her own. She was not accustomed to be held in the arms of men, and yet it had somehow seemed natural to be in his. She said to herself that it was just the impulse of a brother conquered by her prayer and yielding to the victor. She knew that she was nothing to him—not even his sister—while Estelle was still his all. Yet that silent caress had been more precious than she liked to own or dared to think. Her father's favorite name for her danced in her brain to the music of Anthony's voice, not his; and "You Delight!" was hammered out with every beat of the piston, and swung through the air in every turn of the wheels. She did her best to get away from these conscious, too, of a strange sense of happiness of which she was half afraid, and of shame for which she blushed, when she thought, through which ran an unacknowledged thread of disappointment in that Anthony had not come to the station, as she expected. But, clinging as they were, they did not make her central feeling—her duty to Estelle—the less potent or clear. Still, they distracted and disturbed her. She tried to banish them; to fix her thoughts on Estelle's sufferings, her despair, her loss, her sorrows; but these faded away into a vague kind of mournful cloud, while "You Delight!" rang out between the iron staves like sweetest music—that silent, strong embrace repeated itself in her memory—and the thread of disappointed hope in that she had not seen Anthony at the station as she had hoped waxed broader and thicker and deeper in tone.

Then, wearied and overcome by all this emotion, she burst into tears as she buried her face in the pillow provided for the night journey and with a sudden conviction of unspoken sin prayed for pardon, grace, and light with the whole fervor of her throbbing heart. And then she slept.

When she awoke the sun was shining; Estelle was near; and Anthony was banished from her thoughts. She had been through the Valley, and the fire had scorched and blistered her overnight. To-day she was in the clear light of heaven, and her pain had passed.

CHAPTER X.

THE SHEEP AND THE GOATS.

Hard words break no bones. Neither do angry ones mend them when broken. Anthony Harford proved this when he was lying on the road with a snapped "tibia"—happily the fracture was simple, not compound—because his fiery young horse, with the hot temper and highly strung nerves, had first shied at a traction engine, then bolted, and finally smashed the trap into match-wood, and emptied its contents by the way-side, leaving groom, luggage, and master in a mass of moving conglomerate, while he himself ran up a bank and snorted like a demon over the spill below.

Had it not been for this untoward accident, which Anthony's full-flavored Americanisms in no wise helped, Lady Elizabeth would not have gone to Mentone alone. He had fully intended to go with her, partly for her own sake, but in greater part for Estelle's. The fire of his wrath against his faithless wife had died down, and that conversation with her dear advocate had left only infinite compassion for the suffering woman. He had no love for her now—at least so he assured himself. Still it was exquisite pain to him to think that Estelle should be in need of aught that he could give her. That girl, whom he had so passionately loved—that fair-faced, bashful, and reluctant maid, whom he had held in his arms and called his own, and who he had made himself believe was his own in heart and mind as well as person—her reluctance counting for shyness—that she, who bore his name and was the mother of his son, should take from another what it was his duty to supply—what torture! what degradation! He longed to be the hand to lift her above all forms of want; but in his own clear mind he wished that she would die. He saw no good for her should she live. He would not take her back; and for his son's sake he did not care to divorce her. He did not wish to put her shame on the record forever, and so scar the mother of his child with such an ineffaceable brand; and if she were ill, as Lady Elizabeth had said, he would not harm her, and he did not mean now to kill himself because of her. But he would forgive her. He wanted to forgive her before she died—to know that she sank into the deep river of eternity with his blessing, his pardon, and the sense and glory of his past love about her. Then she would be at peace with herself, and he would have satisfied his conscience.

Had Charlie Osborne still lived he could not have come to this state of mind. But as things were, with his rival dead, all the passions roused by the late bitter tragedy had faded into so many shadows, and the only concrete fact that remained was the physical distress and pecuniary need of this poor simulacrum of her former self. The essential Estelle had died when she left Thrift and her child for the evil ways of unfaithfulness and dishonor.

Still, though only this simulacrum of the woman he had so ardently loved, Anthony would have gone to her had he been able. But when a man is lying on a heavily metalled road, with one sturdy leg bent and broken under him, he is not very fit for a twenty-four hours' journey by land and sea, let the desire be never so strong, the need never so pressing. Patience, in the form of splints and plaster of Paris, has to be taken instead, and full-flavored Americanisms do not help matters one jot.

So this was the reason why Lady Elizabeth was disappointed at the railway station, and the construction she had put on Anthony's words was not justified by his deeds. She understood it all when she reached Mentone, and a telegram gave her the bare outline of what had happened. A letter would follow, said the brief notice; and with this Lady Elizabeth had to be content till the letter did arrive which gave all the details.

The arrival of Lady Elizabeth at the first gave Estelle a spell of renewed mental vigor. She recovered her intellectual tone as a slackened fire blazes up with a fresh supply of fuel. It was almost like the shadow of her beloved thrown across the darkness of her days to have Lady Elizabeth here—she who was so bound up with the earlier part of this grievous history, and who in a manner reproduced the past and redeemed the present. And oh, for ingratitude of the beloved who do not love!—it was a relief beyond words to have some one about her other than that faithful slave who did all that was necessary for her material well-being, but who supplied no element of personal happiness and no spiritual sustenance. She could bear with his queer awkward ways and irritating devotion now that Lady Elizabeth was there to, in a manner, share the burden of his personality; and she felt altogether freer than she had done—freer, that is, from the incubus of her dark depression, and more able to understand herself and her surroundings. Thus it was that Estelle rallied for the first days and even weeks of Lady Elizabeth's arrival, and cheated her friends into the delusive hope of possible permanent recovery.

It was a curious psychological fact that she seemed to have entirely forgotten her marriage with Anthony Harford and her motherhood of his child. Though she left off living on his grave, her whole talk was of Charlie. She spoke of him, however, more in relation to her girlish life—more as the young lover forbidden by the authorities—than as the dying husband of these later times. Lady Elizabeth did not know if this was a purely mental phenomenon or an act of reticence for the sake of morality she had outraged. She never discovered which it was, for she was too tender to bring the poor sinner to book, and force from her the confession of a sin she did not regret and the expression of a repentance she did not feel.

Meanwhile Anthony Harford's broken bone was knitting together as vigorously as such a man's naturally would, with his certain advent when he should be able to move, supported on crutches and strengthened by splints.

One day the three were sitting on the seat outside the garden of the hotel where they were staying, basking in the sun and looking at the gentain-colored sea before them. Estelle was in one corner of the seat and Lady Elizabeth was next to her. Screwed up as far away in the other corner as was possible, and sitting awkwardly, as beseemed his modesty, Caleb watched each breath of those parted lips, studied each expression of that flower-like face—lovely and flower-like yet, for all its comparative deadness—looking every now and then at Lady Elizabeth as a dog looks to its master, a deaf-mute to his instructor. It was one of Estelle's favorable days, when her brain was clearer than usual, and the dulness of her senses was broken up, as it were, by light and the free air. She was almost the Estelle of her former happy and innocent days—had she ever ceased to be intrinsically innocent? and Lady Elizabeth, whose mission was to heal, not scarify—soothe, not sting—felt her own heart all the lighter for the temporary sunshine over her friend.

Suddenly voices only too well known struck on their ears, and the Medlicotts came into view. They had been as far as Florence, but had turned back on their steps and had taken Mentone on their way home. This was against the wish of the husband, but by the will of the wife; and that will—quiet, persistent, unrelaxing, undeviating—was beginning to make headway against the other's wish. One of those unaggressive women who are never in open opposition, Anne knew how to have her own way without a quarrel and without defeat. And as she was devoured with curiosity to learn all about those dreadful people, as she called Estelle and her faithful slave, she was determined to gratify it. It was the curiosity of ignorance just dashed by prudency, with the desire of outraged propriety to have its say on the evil litany chanted between love and sin. She had heard by now of Lady Elizabeth's last craze, as Mrs. Aspline termed it; and she felt that she must see with her own eyes how far that madness of sympathy had committed the Lily of Kingshouse to complicity with crime. She felt so much stronger and bigger in her perfect spotlessness than them all, even than Lady Elizabeth! She, Anne Aspline, the somewhat snubbed daughter of a decidedly snubbed mother, now holding the ferule over the heads of those who had formerly rapped her knuckles! To be sure Lady Elizabeth in her own person had never rapped her knuckles, nor any other's, but she belonged to those who had; and class solidarity is a fact like any other.

The persistency of Anne's mind in her eager contemplation of Estelle's fault was a strange study in human nature. For all her strong condemnation, she could not forego the unwholesome fascination which this naughtiness had for her. It was the same fascination that a book of Zola's has for his readers. They condemn it, and call it shocking and horrible and monstrous and depraved, but all read to the end. No one shuts the book and puts it in the fire unfinished—that fascination being even more absorbing than the condemnation is strong. So with Anne. This fearful corruption, as it seemed to her, of a girl whom she had personally known, and who had been on a higher social platform than herself, was a page of living Zolaism which she must read to the last words, that bad taste in her mouth notwithstanding.

To herself her desire to still pursue and denounce this evil-doer made her no more cruel than was the Jewish executioner when he flung the first stone at the sinners against morality, and offered them up as sacrifices to the offended virtue of the race and the mutilated majesty of the law.

"Oh, how can Lady Elizabeth do such a thing!" she said, loud enough to be heard, as she forced her husband to halt within ear-shot of the trio. "I wanted so much to speak to her, but how can I when she is sitting familiarly with that infamous woman and that awful man!"

"Hush, my dear!—softly, Annette!" said Mr. Medlicott, in a lower voice.

He was not so keen on this testifying of virtue as was his young wife, and he was naturally more pitiful to Estelle.

"Why should I hush?" cried Anne, shrilly. "Do you think it very pleasant for me to see Lady Elizabeth—a friend who has dined in our house and we in hers—lower herself to such infamous surroundings as a runaway wife and a common miner like that horrid Mr. Stagg?"

"Lady Elizabeth is not a child, my dear; she knows her own affairs best, and what she wishes to do, and how to conduct herself," was the reply. "Come on, Annette," he added, moving away. "I dislike this publicity so much! It is not ladylike, my dear. It is not Christian."

"It is right," said Anne, her mouth set close, and her upper lip pulled down, as was her wont when recalcitrant and determined. "This creature is a shameless sinner, and Lady Elizabeth ought not to be with her."

All this was heard with cruel distinctness by the three on the seat. Such wind as there was set that way, and brought the sounds sharply to the senses. Estelle's face first paled as her ears took in Anne's words and their meaning became clear to her mind. Then it flamed with fever and excitement, and her large eyes glistened and shone with dangerous brilliancy. Caleb stirred in his place like a hound held in leash, looking now at Anne, with indignation staring in his round red-lidded eyes, now at Estelle with half-terrified compassion, and again at Lady Elizabeth as if for direction.

"That she ever could!" he kept on saying to himself. "That she ever could—and this queenly lass—as she is not herself, as one might say!"

"That fearful girl—she is like a ghoul" said Estelle with a shudder. "She helped to kill my darling. He would have lived longer if she had not spoken as she did. And now she has come to kill me."

"Do not mind her, Estelle," said Lady Elizabeth, soothingly. "She never had much intellect, and what she has is all perverted by false views. Do not care for what she says."

"No, I do not care for what she says to me," said Estelle, feverishly, knocking up the dust with her parasol. "But she killed my darling," she added; "and for that I can never forgive her."

"You are a clergyman," then came Anne's voice, speaking still more distinctly to her retreating husband. "You ought to speak to them."

"My dear, I am a man and a gentleman as well as a priest," said Mr. Medlicott, with firm rebuke.

"But the priest comes first," said Anne, "and you ought to speak both to Lady Elizabeth and that infamous creature. She should not be allowed to remain here. It is too bad of these hotel-keepers—insulting proper people like this."

"'Who maketh His rain to fall on the just and the unjust,'" said Mr. Medlicott, in his parsonic voice.

"We are not God," said Anne; "and Lady Elizabeth no more than any one else."

"I must put a stop to this," said Lady Elizabeth; and with the words she rose from her place and went straight to where the Medlicotts stood, he temporizing and she testifying, while Estelle knocked up the dust with the end of her parasol, and Caleb stood so that she should not see the group, which by now had moved away out of hearing. But something had come into Estelle's face that had not been there before, and she had a certain look of recoil on herself that might turn to danger.

Niagara Episcopal Endowment Fund.

The Evangelical Churchman says: There seems to be a reasonable prospect that the long-standing dispute between the Dioceses of Niagara and Toronto, with regard to the Episcopal Endowment Fund of the former, will be amicably settled at an early date. The Synod of Niagara claims that portion of the fund of the original Diocese of Toronto which had been raised in the Niagara district of the diocese, and valued at about $10,000. Upward of twenty years ago a clause was added to the by-law on Episcopal Endowment, declaring that when the fund yielded more than $4,000 annually the surplus should be given to Niagara. Thus far such is practically the statement of the Toronto Synod, the fund has yielded only $4,000, and nothing more; if anything, less. But whatever be the exact state of the case, the question in reality turns largely upon the relative value of the investments already made. It is understood that as a result of correspondence between the two dioceses, the dispute will be settled by the payment to the Niagara Synod of about $5,000. It is to be hoped that, in the interests of peace and good-will, some such agreement will be arrived at, and arrangements made in order that the bone of contention may be removed.

ROBERT A. GUNN, M. D., Dean and Professor of Surgery of the United States Medical College, Editor of "Medical Tribune," author of "Gunn's New Improved Handbook of Hygiene and Domestic Medicine," says over his own signature in addressing the proprietors of Warner's Safe Cure: "I cannot be true to my convictions unless I extend a helping hand and endorse all I know to be good and trustworthy. Your graphic descriptions of diseases of the kidneys and liver have awakened the medical profession to the fact of their great increase. Physicians have been experimentally treating this disease, and while casting about for an authorized remedy, their patients have died on their hands."

THE OAKLAND HERD.

Good Prices Obtained at the Sale of Mr Fuller's Famous Stock in New York.

A New York despatch says: When Peter C. Kellogg & Co. opened the auction sale of the noted Oakland herd of Jersey cattle, late the property of Mr. Valancey E. Fuller, of Hamilton, Canada, at the American Institute building yesterday, the ring presented an appearance that recalled the booming days of 1882 and 1886. Faces of many admirers of the cream giving little cow that have been missed from the sales of late years reappeared and offered their bids with much the same spirit and enthusiasm that characterized the sales in past years. The results were very satisfactory to all interested. They show that admirers of the Jersey still stand ready to pay liberal prices for animals that appear worthy to be used for the purpose of raising the standard quality of the breed. Commonplace animals were rejected at prices barely above utility rates, but animals worthy to be used as blood sources in conformity with nature's rule of the survival of the fittest brought willing bids until good prices were reached, and an average of $608 on the twenty-nine head constituting the Oakland herd was made. The cattle sent in by Mr. G. S. Hutchinson were less desirable in breeding as in quality, but sold fairly well. The sale will be continued to-day with consignments by Messrs. A. H. Moore, Oakleigh Thorne, Benjamin L. Swan, jun., and others. The better prices yesterday were as follows:

GAVE HER HIS HEART AND WEALTH

Suicide Selleck Leaves Money to a Widow who Rejected Him.

A Norwalk, Conn., despatch says: The will of James B. Selleck, who committed suicide on the morning of April 11th by plunging head foremost into a well on his premises at Darien, just admitted to probate, leaves a fortune of about $30,000, the bulk of which he gives to the widow of George Daskam, formerly of Norwalk. It is reported that Mr. Selleck proposed marriage at one time to Mrs. Daskam, but was refused in consequence of differing views upon financial matters. This rejection, together with the fear of dying in penury, is said to have led him to kill himself. The fact has lately come out that the deceased made an attempt to commit suicide by shooting himself in the head about a week before his leap into the well. Mr. Selleck's wife died several years ago without leaving any children, and the natural heirs of the estate, of whom there are over twenty, will make a strong fight against the will, alleging that improper influence was brought to bear upon the testator in favor of Mrs. Daskam at a period when he was of unsound mind and incapable of making legal disposition of his estate.

THE DEAD ALIVE.

A Young Woman's Unexpected Return Home Causes a Sensation.

A Franklin, Pa., despatch says: Miss Annie Griffiths arrived here unexpectedly to-day. Two years ago her relatives received a despatch giving an account of her death by foul means in Kansas. The body of a woman was found in Kansas City, in whose dress pocket was found a letter addressed to Annie Griffiths, Franklin, Pa., and whose cuffs were marked with that lady's initials. As Miss Griffiths was in the West, her friends telegraphed to have the remains sent here, but they had already been buried and it was thought best not to disturb them. For over two years Annie has been mourned as dead, and the sensation she created among her relatives by suddenly appearing before them can be better imagined than described. She is at a loss to account for the finding of the letter in the pocket of the dead woman, and does not give much account of herself, only saying she has been in the West.

Two Fashion Notes.

When a father in Madagascar gets the notion that his daughter ought to marry he puts a rope around her neck and leads her forth, and the first young man he offers her to has got to take her or pay a forfeit.

When a Frenchman enters a shop in Paris, if it be of modest proportions and he can see the shop keeper or his wife, he doffs his hat and makes as polite a bow as if he had entered the presence of the President of the Republic.

Cause for Grievance.

Flathers—What's the masher, Mrs. Duffy—yer seem out o' sorrits?

Mrs. Duffy—An' enough to make me. Duffy's gone off on a drunk and he'll be batin' the loife out of some wan else. It's the first toime since our marriage he neglected me!

A Criticism of Canada.

"And what do you think of our country, My Lord."

Lord Tomnoddy Oh, there's too much of it. No people could furnish nobility for such an extent of territory.

There are more than eighty national cemeteries in America containing in all 315,555 graves. Of these 133,146 are the graves of unknown soldiers.

FROM THE FAR WEST.

The C. P. R. has advanced money to the German colonists at Dunmore to buy cattle. An agent is now in Southern Manitoba purchasing the stock.

Definite information has reached this city that the C. P. R. will build a branch from Brandon to the Souris coal fields and also an extension of the Southwestern branch from Deloraine west to meet the Brandon-Souris branch. The distance from Brandon to the coal beds is 100 miles, and from Deloraine to the proposed junction 25 miles. Both projected lines will run through well settled sections of country, and in addition to the benefit that will be derived by farmers, they will be the means of developing the coal deposits of the Souris. The work will probably begin shortly.

The millers to-day withdrew from the agreement with the grocers not to retail flour. This is quite a serious blow to the Grocers' Association.

Mr. Stewart Mulvey's letter, resigning his connection with the Winnipeg Conservative Association, has been made public, and he says: "It must be apparent to all that the efforts of the association to build up and maintain a Conservative party in this Province have now and have always been completely ignored by our Ottawa leaders, and that as often as we build up they pull down. I am sick and tired of the way the party has been treated in this Province. It does appear to me that the Ottawa people by their actions for some years have manifested a desire to see Reform rule in this country, and after mature consideration I have come to the conclusion that there is little use in endeavoring to resist the will of the Ottawa people."

The summer carnival scheme is likely to be abandoned owing to the disinclination of the Government to give the necessary financial assistance.

Mr. J. A. Donaldson has been appointed city freight agent of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Mr. F. W. Peters, of Port Arthur, will be appointed local agent in succession to Mr. Belcher.

The Greenway Government have offered the promoters of the proposed summer carnival $1,000. This is utterly inadequate, and the project will probably fall through.

A baby named Martin died at the baptismal font in the Church of the Redeemer at Calgary while being christened The affair caused a panic in the church.

A number of mounted policemen at Prince Albert recently broke into Superintendent Perry's quarters during the absence of that official and helped themselves to liquors. A number of arrests were then made.

Humphrey Keller, 70 years old, was found dead outside of his shanty near Rapid River, Rainy River, with the left side of his head smashed in by a blunt instrument. Suspicion rests on a Dane named Neil Johnston, who lived with the deceased. Johnston has been missing since two days before the discovery of the body. Keller's neighbor, Edward Connors, found the corpse with his (Connors') dog watching it. None of the deceased's property is disturbed. The cause of the murder is a mystery yet, but is believed to have taken place during drunken orgies.

Barefooted Children.

Children who are allowed to go barefooted enjoy almost perfect immunity from the danger of "cold" by accidental chilling of the feet, and they are altogether healthier and happier than those who, in obedience to the usages of social life, have their lower extremities permanently invalided, and, so to say, carefully swathed and put away in rigid cases. As regards the poorer classes of children there can be no sort of doubt in the mind of any one that it is incomparably better they should go barefooted than wear boots that let in the wet, and stockings that are nearly always damp and foul.—London Lancet.

A Smart Milkman.

"The milk that I got of you this morning soured."

"You didn't get it of me, ma'am.

'Well, Bridget did. It's all the same."

'No, it isn't, ma'am. She's so ugly that she'd make any milk turn sour. Now, as you are very handsome, why, when you get the milk, ma'am——"

'I didn't think of that. I'll get the milk myself after this."

"Pause, My Brethren!"

'Most of you," said the Bishop of Peterborough once to some candidates for ordination, "will do well to avoid action in the pulpit. I shall never forget a raw-boned Irish curate I once had, with hands like legs of mutton. I can see him still preparing for a grand peroration, and leaning over the pulpit with outstretched dependent palms, as he exclaimed, 'Paws, me brithren, paws!'"

A Texas Romance.

A mouse in a Texas dairy fell into a pan-ful of milk. It swam round and round in its efforts to get out, but in vain. However, through the activity of its movements the milk was at last churned into butter, and the mouse steered a butter raft to the pan's edge. Then jumping out it ran at once to the cracker box to utilize the taste of butter in its throat.—Anonymous.

WAS SHE A BORGIA?

Mrs. Chandler's Romantic Career, her Husbands and Their Mysterious Deaths.

A Mobile, Ala., despatch says: Carrie E. Holbrook Chandler, the mother of Mrs. James Maybrick, who is charged with poisoning Maybrick in Liverpool, is a woman with a very romantic career.

Miss Holbrook came here about 1856 visiting her uncle Rev. J. H. Ingraham, rector of St. John's Church, author of the Prince of the House of David." She was very popular in society, being a good conversationalist, handsome though not pretty, and quiet and prepossessing in demeanor. Among those who joined her troop of admirers was young William G. Chandler, son of one of the most prominent merchants of the city. Chandler was one of the most agreeable of Mobile's young men, educated and refined and quite successful in business. The two young people were mutually taken with one another and he followed her to her home in New York city, where they were married.

AN ALIMES AFFAIR.

Returning to Mobile they lived in good style, and Mrs. Chandler increased her influence in society. She was as much of a belle as before marriage, and her society was especially sought by young men. It was at the beginning of the civil war that Frank Dubassy turned up, being a captain in the Ordnance Department of the Confederate Government.

Captain Frank was a remarkably handsome man and a dashing officer. He fell in with the Chandlers and soon there was some talk of his attentions to the lady. Suddenly Mr. Chandler fell ill. He grew rapidly worse and his relatives came to offer their assistance, but were refused admittance to the house. Chandler died, attended by no one but the young wife, and the report arose that he had been killed by her. There was no official investigation of the charge, but it affected her position, which became so unpleasant that she took her two children and moved to Macon, Ga.

In less than a year she married Dubassy there. Shortly afterward Dubassy was ordered to go to Europe as a representative of the Confederate Government. He and his family took passage on a blockade runner out of Charleston or Savannah, it is not known which, and had proceeded but a couple of days when Dubassy, who had been complaining, suddenly died.

The captain of the steamer proposed to return to port in order that the officer might be interred, but the widow strenuously insisted that the vessel should continue. She said that she did not like the risk of turning the vessel back and demanded that the body be cast overboard. This was done, and the vessel reached Europe in due time.

MORE SCANDALS.

In a year or two she drifted back to New York, where she was involved in a scandal with some actor, which was published in the papers at the time and created a great sensation. After this she went again to Europe and met and married Baron Von Roque. There was shortly a scandal with him also, and it is said he was not faithful to her, and at one time he gave her a beating, so she left him. It seems that they led an adventurous life together

After separating from Von Roque the lady became a woman of the world, and when last heard from was filling the equivocal position of "wife" of an attache of the British Legation at Teheran, Persia.

James Maybrick, who is said to have been poisoned by his wife Florence Maybrick, the daughter of Mrs. Chandler, was well known and liked here and in New Orleans. He met the young lady in Europe.

A COLLECTOR OF POISONS.

A gentleman who was well acquainted with Mrs. Chandler during her residence in Mobile stated to day that she had a regular mania for collecting all sorts of poisons. In other words she was a thorough amateur toxicologist. She had collected poisons from all parts of the world, and took great pride in her collection, which she had in a fine cabinet with each poison carefully labelled.

The gentleman in question once visited her house by invitation to inspect this result of a strange "fad." She entertained him for hours discoursing on the effect and nature of each deadly agent and showed such an unusual knowledge of toxicology that ever after the narrator says he entertained a peculiar dread of the woman, fearing that some day she might be seized with a desire to experiment on him.

THE WAVE.

I bathe the feet of the maidens sweet
As they gambol upon the shore,
And the swimmer strong I buoy along
As he seeks the breaker's roar
The sea birds rest, as though in their nest,
On the curve of my swaying form,
And I rock them to sleep on my bosom deep,
In a cradle soft and warm
And I sing the song of the ages long
As a lullaby to each—
The sound of the waves as they break in the caves
Or surge on the sandy beach.

St. Joseph's Church, Stratford, was entered by burglars during Thursday night. They opened the tabernacle of the main altar, from which they took two gold vessels used for containing the sacrament. They broke open the alms boxes and carried off all they contained. Strange to say they left four large sized chalices untouched.

Capt. Murrell, of the steamer Missouri, which rescued the passengers and crew of the Danmark, paid a visit on Saturday to Colchester, his native place, and was given a most enthusiastic reception by the citizens. That evening a banquet was given in honor of the captain, at which Mr Henry George, on behalf of American friends, presented him with a gold watch In the course of his speech, Mr. George denounced the "mean policy of Protection which had taxed the American ships off the ocean."

A young Mississippian named Chalmers, who had charge of the stock on Colonel Gray's plantation, at Pine Bluff, Ark., saw a negro named Brown cruelly beating a mule with a trace chain. He forced Brown to desist, and later Brown told the manager of the plantation that he intended to kill Chalmers. On Thursday Chalmers and Brown met in a store, and the negro picked up a stone jug and hurled it at Chalmers, who dodged it, and then shot twice at Brown, wounding him fatally. Chalmers mounted his horse and escaped.

As to Sir Charles Dilke, it must be understood that he is not a candidate for Parliament. He declined to stand for the Forest of Dean last year, but promised to visit the constituency and address the miners. It was during this visit that his lady friends gave him the light of their countenance, for which act they have been called to account. Meantime there is no doubt that Sir Charles is slowly making his way. Quite recently he has been elected Chairman of the Chelsea Board of Guardians, with the goodwill of the Unionist local paper.

William V. Smith, son of Judge Smith, of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, left Halifax, N. J., last Tuesday on the brig Chas. Duncan for a trip to Jamaica. He exhibited signs of insanity, and on Thursday in a fit he broke into a closet, seized a razor, and slashed it across his throat, inflicting a fearful wound. The captain and crew bandaged the wound, and the vessel was put about for Halifax, where she arrived on Saturday morning. Smith is in a critical state, but the doctors think he may recover. He held a position in the Halifax post office, and has a wife and young daughter.

At an early hour on Saturday morning the residence of Mr. D. S. Warner, Napanee, was entered by burglars. Mrs. Warner was roused from her sleep, and was startled to find a man leaning over her bed. The intruder pointed a revolver, saying, "You dare to stir or make a noise and I will fix you." She was not to be intimidated, but sprang from her bed, calling to her husband at the same time. The burglar evidently thought he had got in the wrong place, for he fled to the hall, when he held Mr. Warner at bay with his revolver until he thought his chance good to escape through the front door, which he had prudently unfastened and left ajar before ascending to the chamber. An entrance had been effected through the parlor window. Mr. Warner had a large sum of money in his trousers pocket, but it was untouched. Mrs. Warner's fortunate awakening in all probability saved it from the thief's hands. The lady was quite ill on Saturday, but will soon recover from the effects of her frights.

Died

At 12 Thursday morning, Augusta, wife of Mr J. R. Hagle, Proton, and youngest daughter of Mr Michael Vanstone, patiently and peacefully passed into the rest of the weary. Deceased was cut in the prime of womanhood, being only 27 years 7 mos. old. Although she has been ill for a considerable time her friends, until within a few days, was quite unexpected by the friends and many who all had hopes for her final recovery. But it seems that she had for some time expected the change, and death did not come to her unawares. While we tender our sympathy to the bereaven husband and other friends for the loss of the loved one, who was so universally beloved and respected, we also have a satisfaction in recording the death of one for whom death has no terrors, and who died with the full assurance that Christ is all and in all. The remains were interred on Saturday afternoon, in the English Church cemetery, Markdale, beside her mother, and were followed to the grave by a very large concourse of friends and neighbors. Mr. Ems, Presbyterian minister of Markdale, conducted a short service at the house and the ceremony at the cemetery was conducted by the English Church minister of Markdale. Deceased leaves a little babe ten months old.

Remarkable Surgical Operation.

A good story has leaked out which draws down a laugh upon the devoted heads of two young doctors who went fishing a couple of weeks ago. They had separated, it appears, for mutual advantage, each fishing over separate ground. Along about dinner time one of the fishermen discovered a farmer, and at the same time discovered that he was hungry, and when asked to dine, immediately accepted the hospitality. Shortly afterward physician No. 2 struck the farmer's residence through some strange fatality, and he was also invited to partake of the "frugal meal." He demurred, but finally through fear of injuring somebody's feelings by a refusal acceeded, and threw his fish pole down upon the ground. Now it chanced that an old hen happened along and spied a good fat worm wriggling on the ground. She gobbled it. When she found that the worm owned such an endless tail, her suspicions were aroused, but it was too late. A noticeable paleness spread over her gills, and she opened her mouth and squalled, and jumped and pulled with the energy of despair and long toes, but the fish hook had taken a tenacious hold. When the doctors ran out to discover cause for the noise they found Mrs. hen in an exhausted condition and immediately decided that it was a golden opportunity to practice a little surgery. Accordingly the instruments were brought out and a very neat stroke of oesophagy was performed right there and then. It is needless to say the hen died shortly afterward, owing, as the doctors say, to the exhausted condition of the patient and to the fact of the oesophagus and trachea having become very much inflamed before the delicate operation was performed.

Teachers Convene

A Wet but a Pleasant and Profitable Experience.

The teachers of South Grey have been among us once more. They were not to be in such force as upon the previous occasion, but that was easily accounted for, as the elements detained them at home. Those who did attend contributed themselves amply for having braved the heavy north east rain which fell in torrents all day Thursday, and heartily enjoyed the convention which was a very pleasant one in many respects. There were some forty five teachers present. The village turned out in goodly numbers as usual and showed their continued interest in educational matters thereby. The specialty on this occasion was Mr. Lewis, professor of elocution, from Toronto. On Thursday forenoon there was not a quorum of the teachers present, and an adjournment was made until afternoon, when Mr. Lewis gave an address on the importance of elocution in reading and teaching of the same to a greater extent in our public schools. Mr. Lewis gave several examples of false and proper reading. His interpretation of "Excelsior" was grand and elicited hearty applause. Mr. Lewis is busily engaged in the work of making teachers believe that they do not know the first principles of reading. The subject should be thoroughly taught in the public school, and in order to become proficient to teach a course should be taken under the professor's tuition. Mr. Lewis did not exactly say this—we draw the inference ourselves. For our own part we consider that there was considerable trash in the professor's arguments, and many of his claims are impracticable and not capable of being developed in ordinary school work. Of course his subject was an interesting one, and he showed thorough knowledge of the art, but we fear that his lessons would not be of very great practical benefit to those who heard them.

Mr. Glendinning then read an interesting address on "The power behind the throne," or in other words, the proper use for the gad.

Miss J. Anderson, of Durham, read a most excellent essay on "Politeness in schools." We will not comment on this but will give it in full next week, as Miss Anderson has kindly consented to its publication.

THE EVENING SESSION.

Owing to incessant rain it was feared that the entertainment in the Town Hall would be a failure, but such was not the case. The Hall was crowded to the doors, numbers being obliged to stand. Dr. Christoe occupied the chair. The program was made up of readings by Mr. Lewis, excellent music by the Glee Club, and solos by Miss Bell Christoe, Mr. Evans and Mr. Ed. Richardson. The entertainment altogether was an excellent one, although there was a noticeable sense of disappointment throughout the audience after Mr. Lewis had completed his readings. Perhaps all had been led to expect something extraordinary, and the fact that they were nothing better than we had heard before was the probable cause of this. His selections were: "Horatius' defence of the bridge," "How David Copperfield wooed and won Dora," "Picket of the Potomac," "The Revenge," "Conversion of Col. Quagg" and "The old bachelor," none of which were rendered with the excellence of interpretation which he gave to "Excelsior" in the afternoon. They were all very enjoyable nevertheless. Votes of thanks were unanimously passed to Mr. Lewis, the chairman and those who assisted so well in the musical portion.

On Friday morning Mr. Lewis renewed his lessons on elocution, after which Dr. Christoe spoke for a short time, comparing old and new systems of education. Mr. Allan gave a lesson on object drawing, with class, which was very interesting. The same gentleman gave a paper on "Teacher as a student." Mr. Campbell read a magnificent paper on "Character building." It was one of the best constructed papers which we have ever heard read, and will shortly be published in full in these columns. Should we have sufficient encouragement from the teachers and others, Mr. Campbell's and Miss Anderson's essay will be published in pamphlet form at five cents per copy. This completed the time of the convention and the convention adjourned, however several items on the programme for next session.

Court of Revision

The Court of Revision for 1889 met in the Town Hall on 3rd inst. Present, Messrs Christoe, McArthur, Boland, Shepard and Caine. After each made necessary affidavits a motion to Court opened with the following business was disposed of.

M. Matt appealed against assessment of grist mill at Eugenia. Reduced $500.

Wm. R. Morrow was assessed as owner for Pt 163, con 18.

T. Watt appealed on account of fire to Building at Price's Corners. Lot assessed at $100.

The C. P. Railway Co. appealed against the assessment of railway on account of incorporation of village of Markdale. They thought the assessment of the road was reduced, but as Attorney-at-law does not reside in Markdale on west side of Toronto line, this could not be possible. Appeal dismissed.

A McInnes appealed against assessment of lot 24 Fifth or Static having too high. Assessment reduced $300.

S. L. Johnston appealed against assessment of saw mill at Eugenia as being too high. Raised $200.

George W. [illegible] was assessed as owner [illegible] $5,000.

After some other minor changes in Roll, it was moved by Mr. McArthur, seconded by Mr. Boland, that the Assessment Roll as now revised by this Court of Revision be certified as the Roll for all assessment purposes for the current year. Carried.

After the Court of Revision Council met for general Township business. Minutes of last session read and approved. A letter from J. W. Frost Esq., asking on behalf of Wm. Hogg what action the Council intend taking in opening road between 3 range east and 5th con. and roads between 8 and 9 concession, also the Valley Road.

Moved by Mr. Boland, seconded by Mr. McArthur, that the assessor be paid his salary, $80, and five dollar for postage, etc. Carried.

Mr. McArthur moved, seconded by Mr. Sharp, that upon a written certificate of Commissioner, the Reeve is instructed to issue cheques for road jobs and that the Pathmasters of Flesherton be loaned $100 or until rates are collected. Carried.

Council adjourned.

A Lady's Trip to the Golden State via C. P. R.

Rat Portage to Winnipeg—The Boundless Prairie—A Glimpse of the Rockies.

Specially Written for The Advance.

At Rat Portage we are allowed about 20 minutes for lunch. Most of the passengers made a rush for the town, some to secure provisions, and others to see what was to be seen. The town is beautifully situated on an outlet of the Lake of the Woods. This is the largest body of water touched between Lake Superior and the Pacific, and is certainly [illegible] had touched at yet. On our return to the train we were somewhat amused by one of our juvenile passengers telling us with quite a disappointed look on his face that he could find no rats, supposing from the name there would be a plentiful supply on hand. Leaving here and crossing a high iron bridge, we shoot through a tunnel and presently find ourselves at the little village of Keewatin [illegible] distant. Here we see a [illegible] and built of granite, quarried on the spot. We were [illegible] leave this [illegible] place, as it was the first along the [illegible] that we thought we should care to reside at. [illegible] of lakes were passed in quick succession for miles. Still frost [illegible], although the weather was more like May than that of April. No snow was to be found anywhere except in one or two instances where we saw small patches here and there in the depths of the forest between North Bay and Port Arthur.

Arriving at Winnipeg about 10 o'clock [illegible] we therefore [illegible] of the town. Having an hour here we saw a good deal of Main Street, as the streets were still well lighted, as well as many of the stores being open. It having rained, the assertion that Winnipeg mud [illegible] glue were somewhat similar was [illegible] which our shoes fully testified to on our return to the train. After we got on board, our party got into a warm political discussion, as we had a good Tory on board and a Grit from Whitby, so the [illegible] passed merrily, and it was the [illegible] [illegible] before we thought of retiring. Next morning we arrived at Brandon about 6 a.m. It is nicely situated on high ground with gradual rise from the [illegible] and presents a fine appearance for a young town. The railway now draws [illegible] from the Assiniboine river and crosses [illegible] undulating prairie. From [illegible] to Regina we saw very little to break [illegible] of the journey. That was [illegible] that we felt the [illegible] and the only day we devoted [illegible] as it was almost impossible heretofore to settle down [illegible]. We pass frequent [illegible] alkaline waters, with [illegible] around.

This part of the country should certainly be considered the sportsman's [illegible]. While passing through the N. W. T. our train was boarded at every station by mounted policemen in search of [illegible] as none is allowed to be brought into the territories.

Before coming to Indian Head [illegible] distant from Regina about 44 [illegible] we enter the celebrated Bell Farm [illegible] the Government. The furrows [illegible] are usually plowed four miles [illegible] and to plough one furrow outward and another returning is half a day's work for man and team. Therefore we were some time passing through this extensive farm which embraces 100 square miles. At Indian Head are the headquarter's buildings, as well as many of the farm laborer's cottages. This is about the centre of the farm. Whenever we stop at a station the gentlemen amused themselves by shooting gophers, gathering bunches of prairie flowers a pretty blue-bell shaped flower growing about three inches high, with soft, downy stems or gathering around a span of harnessed oxen. This was something novel to Ontario people, and curious enough to be looked at. On one occasion we saw six span, or yoke of oxen harnessed together.

Sometimes antelope in the distance, or an Indian on his pony galloping over the plains throwing out his lasso, or a piece of fence here and there, (which prevents snow from drifting on the track,) would sometimes break the monotony, and rest the eyes, which were wearied from gazing on the unbroken plain. We were not at all sorry on nearing Regina, to see the sun set in the west, and to know that this monotonous waste will soon be shut out from view. It does very well to read about the fine, careless life of the inhabitant of the prairie, but we thought we should prefer reading about it any time than living it. Many a home we passed seemed entirely isolated, without tree, shrub or even animal life surrounding it, nothing to be seen but the sky overhead, and as far as the eye can reach in all directions nothing but this vast level plain. To them an occasional passing train must indeed be welcome. Many of the villages seemed to be a collection of houses set here and there promiscuously in a large field, without any order or arrangement, so far as lots or streets are concerned, and as for any one having their own yard or lot (if there were any) enclosed, it apparently had never been thought of.

About a mile beyond Regina is the Lieutenant Governor's residence, also the headquarters of the Northwest mounted police. The barracks, officer's quarters, store houses and drill shed, together form quite a village. The mounted police number 1,000 men, who are stationed here and there over the Northwest to look after the Indians. They are all healthy, stalwart, fine appearing men. Their [illegible] military dress and bearing presented quite a contrast to that of the Indians, who are dirty, dejected, uncouth looking creatures. Yet they were the two extremes which were always to be seen at [illegible] stations [illegible] Wed[illegible] [illegible] after [illegible] we arrived at Medicine Hat, situated on the South Saskatchewan river. We here cross the river by a fine steel bridge. It is navigable for some distance above and 800 miles below. From this out the country becomes more broken, and at Medicine Hat is quite hilly. After we have gone some 50 miles farther we see the Rocky Mountains coming into view, which are 150 miles away. From this to Calgary [illegible] we enter the [illegible]. We travel a beautiful tract of country. Here and there [illegible] the [illegible] in the villages we see the tents of the Cree and Blackfeet Indians. Usually on our train nearing the station they may be seen running at full speed towards it, but would stop about 100 yards away and only on one or two occasions did they come near enough [illegible] to speak to them. These were [illegible] in all the glory of paint and [illegible]. They stood there on the [illegible] with their wigwams and their war paint [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Calgary [illegible] as the [illegible] Bran[illegible] and [illegible] river. It is [illegible] situated on Bow river at the foot of the Rockies. [illegible] however, 50 miles away. It is surrounded by the foot hills. From the station [illegible] be seen the signs of [illegible] and [illegible] J[illegible] respectively formerly Flesherton boys, their place of business being only about five minutes walk from the station. I was sorry our train had only [illegible] of time, therefore we did not have the pleasure of seeing them. You would suppose that most of the town had come down to see the train come in, as the [illegible] was immense on the platform. [illegible] here we follow the windings of the [illegible] river for about 100 miles, passing through a rich valley with luxuriant meadows and plateaus, the plateaus [illegible] terraces on the sides of the hills. Extensive ranches are passed in quick succession with herds of horses in the valley, cattle on the terraces and sheep on the hill tops, pretty homesteads nestling on the hill sides on the borders of ravines or mountain gorges. Now we begin to get the mountain breeze and the wind gets much colder as we near the mountains. It is a continuous changing from side to side of the car as picture after picture is presented to our view, now on this side, then on that.

About 50 miles from Calgary we come to what is called the Gap. This is a bend in the line which brings the train between two vertical walls of rock. This is the gap by which the rocky mountains are entered. Now we have > Passed the mountains of the prairie,

> Passed the land of crows and foxes,
> Passed the dwellings of the Blackfeet,
> Come into the Rocky Mountains.

Approaching Gap station, a fine view of Wind mountain on the right, and Three Sisters on the left, is obtained. Of course we have no idea we could in any way convey or picture to you the grandeur of the scene, but will simply attempt an outline of what is to be seen.

AN AWFUL CALAMITY.

A Terrible Flood in Pennsylvania.

Thousands of People Drowned and Burned—A Graphic Description of the Awful Scene.

On Friday night last occurred, in Pennsylvania, one of the most awful catastrophes in the history of this continent, caused by the bursting of a [illegible]

The reservoir lies about eighteen miles north of Johnstown [illegible] site of the old reservoir which was [illegible] [illegible] vania canal. This sheet of water was formerly known as Conemaugh Lake. It is from 200 to 300 feet above the level of Johnstown, being in the mountains. It is about three and one-half miles long and from a mile to a mile and a quarter in width, and in some places one hundred feet in depth. It holds more water than any other reservoir, natural or artificial, in the United States. The lake has been [illegible] in size by artificial means and was held in check by a dam from 700 to 1,000 feet wide. It is 90 feet in thickness at the base and the height is 110 feet. The top has a breadth over 20 feet. The steady [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] water [illegible] streams [illegible] struggle of the water against the embankment. The course of the torrent from the broken dam at the foot of the lake to Johnstown is almost eighteen miles, and with the exception of [illegible] the water passes through a narrow V-shaped valley. F[illegible] below the dam lay the town of [illegible] Fork, where the S[illegible]

The accumulated drift gorged, up at the viaduct to a height of forty feet and then took fire from the upsetting of stoves or lamps. Then were strong men made sick at the sight. SOME HEARTLESS SPECTATORS.

The Polynesian at Quebec—The Scene of the Collision.

A last (Wednesday) night's Montreal despatch says: Captain Taylor, who thus met his first accident in 28 years of seafaring life, has lost everything. "I called the ship's crew to the mainmast," said the captain, "but the steam and the smoke and the spray flying in all directions made it difficult to hear. Many followed me upon the mainmast, and when the vessel turned the mainmast was level with the water. I ran along the mainmast and jumped for the shore. There were a number of persons on shore who could have helped, but they did not even come down to the water's edge. I called upon them to man one of the boats and come to our help, but they either did not understand or would not. The Polynesian was damaged. I had too much to do to look after myself and my boat to pay any attention to her. The Polynesian struck her on the starboard—she was almost in line with the shore too—and crushed in our stern and tore away our sides as if we had struck an iceberg. One of the men was killed when he was coming up from below. He was a quartermaster. When the collision occurred our foretopmast went by the board."

THE PILOT'S STORY.

Celestin Brunet, pilot on the Cynthia, gave the following account: This morning about half past 4 the Polynesian was sighted coming down the river, the Cynthia at the time being nearly opposite the asylum at Longue Pointe. The weather was perfectly clear and those on board were surprised to see the course of the Polynesian. She was crossing the course of the Cynthia, which was, according to marine law, keeping the starboard side of the river. When within fifty feet of each other the Polynesian blew her whistle to signal the other to take the opposite side of the channel. Brunet accordingly put her about and endeavored to cross in front of the Polynesian, but, seeing that it could not be done, gave orders "full speed astern." Before she had even stopped the Polynesian was down on her, striking her on the starboard bow. After the collision the Polynesian kept on her course, and as the Cynthia's forepit only was full of water the captain decided to try and run her ashore and save the cargo. The engines were accordingly started and the ship went on her way, but immediately the bow went down, causing the screw to project above water and at the same time she capsized on her side. Seeing there was no further chance of saving the vessel the officers and men took to the boats.

WOULD NOT HELP.

Some of the sailors stated that the Polynesian after striking the Cynthia steamed right ahead. They claim that had she lowered her boats immediately, she could have rescued the men who were drowned. They complain bitterly of some fifteen men who stood on the shore, heard the cries of the drowning, watched the steamer go down and never put forth an effort to save, although they had two or three boats.

THE INSPECTION.

At about half-past 11 o'clock tugs, upon which were Harbor Engineer Kennedy, Captain Shaw, Port Warden, Captain Riley, A. Boyer, M.P.P., Captain Nolan, of the Alcides, and Captain Taylor, visited the wreck and having pumped out the life boat had it taken away. The position of the vessel was ascertained by sounding and the general opinion is that she is a total loss and not worth the trouble of trying to raise. The only question will be to get the cargo out and the hull out of the way to keep it from being carried down by the ice in the channel next winter. The harbor master and assistant engineer ascertained from the captain the position of the vessel in the river when she was struck by the Polynesian. There is a story that the latter vessel sounded two whistles before she struck the Cynthia. There is a bend in the channel just there and each vessel would be likely to try to avoid just what did happen. Up to 1 o'clock no bodies had been recovered.

SCENE OF THE COLLISION.

The collision occurred a little above Longue Pointe Church. The Cynthia, had she been steered away from shore, would have run aground in shoal water, but the deep water runs in right under the banks, which is precipitous. As the channel here is a natural one and both deep and wide there is no obstruction to shipping, there being plenty of room outside the Cynthia's hull. Capt. Nelson, of the R. & O. steamer Quebec, stated that he met the Polynesian about Cape St. Michel, near Varennes, this morning, and saw something was wrong, as her bows were badly broken and the plates bent and ripped. She looked as if she had run upon rocks. She was proceeding down stream very slowly, followed at a short distance by the Buenos Ayrean. Just below Longue Pointe Church they saw the top of a mast sticking out of the water on the north side of the river, about 100 yards from shore and about midway between the church and the nunnery. At first they thought it was the mast of a yacht, but they saw a couple of ships' boats near by, apparently fast to the davits, and knew that a steamer was lying in deep water, which at that point runs close into the bank. They passed a lot of floating cargo. The channel where the accident happened is in summer 300 feet wide and 27 feet deep, but to-day an experienced pilot said it is fully 500 feet in width with 27 feet of water. The Harbor Board will hold an inquiry into the circumstances. They have the power to suspend either or both pilots, either temporarily or altogether, as they see fit. In the case of the captains they have no jurisdiction, as their certificates are granted by the Board of Trade in England. It is likely an inquiry will be held by the Admiralty Court, Quebec, and thus evidence will be transmitted to the Board of Trade. Foreign companies only are interested in the insurance on the steamer and cargo. The manifest of the Cynthia is light, the cargo consisting of coal and pig iron, shipped at Glasgow.

COULD NOT HAVE STOPPED.

Talking with shipping men as to whether the Polynesian ought not to have stood by the Cynthia and rendered what assistance she could, they said it was utterly impossible. With the "way" on her, caused by the full speed down stream, she could not have stopped, and even if she could have stopped in a short distance she would have been unable to turn in the narrow channel so as to get back to the scene of the accident.

CAPTAINS AND PILOTS.

Captain John Taylor, of the Cynthia, is a Scotchman, about 40 years of age, and has been with the Donaldson Line nearly all his life. Captain Hugh Wylie, of the Polynesian, is a brother of Captain Wylie, who was formerly Commodore of the Allan Line. Pilot Celestin Brunet, of the Cynthia, is 46 years of age and has held his certificate since January 16th, 1878. Louis Z. Bouille, pilot of the Polynesian, is 40 years of age and has held his certificate since February 28th, 1872. Both men are spoken of as careful and sober.

THE SUNKEN STEAMER.

The Cynthia was built on the Clyde in 1880, by D. & W. Henderson, Glasgow, for her owners, the Messrs. Donaldson Bros., of the same city, and is one of a line of five steamers built for the Glasgow and Canada trade, having Montreal for their headquarters in the latter. She is classed at Lloyds as "A 1." Her registered tonnage is 1,400; gross, 2,152 tons; length, 329 feet; breadth, 36 feet, with a depth of hold of 25 feet. The well known shipping firm of Reford & Co. are her agents in Montreal.

Captain Wylie, when seen by a reporter did not wish to make an extended statement, as all would be told when the official investigation into the collision was held. He said, however, that upon meeting the Cynthia he blew his whistle twice and backed his ship. He was on the right side so much so that he could go no further. The Cynthia tried to cross his bows, and that was the cause of the collision. At the time of the accident Capt. Wylie, first officer and the pilot were on the bridge, and all who were on deck at the time on board the Polynesian stated that they did their best to avert the collision.

The passengers on board the Polynesian were in bed when the collision took place, and although they hurried on deck when the crash occurred there was very little confusion. So perfect was the discipline that as soon as the two vessels struck each member of the crew went to his alloted post without a word of command. Both officers and crew of the Allan steamer expressed great regret when they were told of the loss of life on board the Cynthia, as they believed that all of the men on the latter had been as fortunate in escaping from the sunken steamer as the men in their forecastle had been from getting crushed.

The report sent on from Montreal stated that eight men lost their lives on the Cynthia, but this number has been reduced by at least one. James Low, quartermaster of the ill-fated steamer, escaped death and got on board the Polynesian in a most miraculous manner. He states that he was relieved from the wheel shortly before 4 o'clock. He went into the forecastle and drank his coffee. He then went to his berth to get his pipe and tobacco. While he was looking for the latter the crash came and all the men in the forecastle made an effort to get up the stairs to the deck. Low did not like to lose his tobacco and kept looking for it, when the ships closed for a second time. He then crept through the gap in his own vessel into that made in the Polynesian and thus saved his life. He states that the Cynthia's crew consisted of 35 men besides four stow aways (acrobats) who were making their way to Chicago, but one of the poor fellows was drowned.

THE CHICAGO ASYLUM.

How an Insane Institution was Run by Political Heelers.

A Chicago despatch says: In the Insane Asylum investigations on Thursday Dr. Clevenger testified that the attendants were mainly roughs and toughs, and that Dr. Kiernan is utterly unable to prevent brutality. The witness said that in State institutions the expense was about $8 per capita per month, while in Cook county it was at least $12. Cook county had paid as high as $50 a month per capita. Most of the expense was for whiskey. With 1,500 patients in Kankakee the liquor bills amounted to $200 or $300 a year. Here with a community of never over 600 people the bills amounted to $3,000 to $4,000. The excessive cost was largely due to stealings. Rats, mice and all kinds of vermin abounded at the asylum. Dr. Kiernan tried for a month to get fine-tooth combs, but the County Board could not spare the money from the whiskey bills. The witness said Dr. Kiernan himself was incapable of cruelty. The witness had been told there was an attendant taking down everything Kiernan did to report to his political enemies.

The World Moves.

A Wooster, O., despatch says: Probably the first woman ever licensed to perform the marriage ceremony has just been granted papers conveying that authority from the Probate Court of this county. The lady is the Rev. Mrs. Ellen Runkle, the wife of a well-known farmer residing in the northwestern part of the county. She is a regularly ordained minister of the United Brethren denomination.

WILLIAM ROBERTS, M. D., F.R.C. P., of the University of London, Eng., says: "Passive congestion of the kidneys may be present, in which the urine contains not a trace of albumen, while the symptoms of intense venous congestion, dropsy, orthopnœa and pulsating jugulars are present. The urine becomes scanty, high-colored and dense." Warner's Safe Cure has cured thousands of these symptoms, often called diseases, by putting the kidneys in a healthy condition.

A NAVAL HERO.

Honors Upon Honors Heaped Upon Captain Murrell.

HIS CREW NOT FORGOTTEN.

A last (Friday) night's London cable says: The banking account of Captain Murrell, commander of the Missouri, who on the morning of April 6th rescued 735 emigrants from the sinking Danmark in mid-Atlantic, under circumstances of great peril, and at immense personal and commercial risk, must to-day present a much more healthy appearance than it did two months ago. His heroic act has been recognized in three countries in a princely manner, and presents in gold and kind and titular honors have been lavished upon him. The city of London was yesterday afternoon enthusiastic in his honor, while banquets and testimonials await him in Colchester and Cardiff, and there is a strong probability that the freedom of London will be presented to him. His reception in London yesterday eclipsed all previous festivities in his honor. The scene inside the Mansion House was an unusually brilliant one, and when Captain Murrell entered in company with the Lord Mayor the band struck up "See the Conquering Hero Comes." At the same time the entire audience rose en masse, and shouted and hurrahed until the civic walls rung, and completely drowned the music. Men waved their hats and women flourished umbrellas and handkerchiefs, and it was some minutes before silence was restored. All this time Capt. Murrell stood blushing and bowing, and the Lord Mayor encouraged a prolongation of the ovation by leading it a minute later. The applause was resumed when the officers of the Missouri joined their chief on the platform.

The speeches were of a most laudatory character, and replete with references to the nobility of nature, the British pluck and the great humanity of the heroic captain, and every such reference brought the people to their feet with storms of applause. The proceedings commenced by the Lord Mayor calling upon the band to play "Hearts of Oak."

Mr. W. Connolly, Secretary of the Testimonial Committee, described Capt. Murrell's reception in America, and organizing a fund to fete him in England. One thousand and fifty pounds had been paid or promised, and the list was still open. Mr. Connolly said it had been decided to give each member of the crew two months' pay and each officer a gold watch and two months' pay, and the balance, which it was hoped would reach £500, to the captain himself. In spite of all the honors which are being heaped upon him, the captain remained an honest, simple hearted Englishman. He concluded his enumeration of the honors past and prospective arranged for Capt. Murrell, by announcing that when that officer returned to the United States he was to be presented to the President at Washington.

After a speech from the Lord Mayor, in which he paid a high tribute to the captain, the officers and crew of the Missouri, he presented Capt. Murrell with a silver salver, and each officer with a gold medal and a cheque for two months' salary.

When Capt. Murrell rose to respond the whole audience rose at the same time, and cheered vociferously for several minutes. He said that it was with a very high sense of gratitude that he and his crew were present, and he thanked the meeting for the cordial reception that had been accorded them. The gratitude of the people they were the means of saving was sufficient for him and his crew without any further recompense. He spoke of the responsibility he felt when throwing over the cargo, but said he concluded that merchandise was nothing when compared to human life, a sentiment that was loudly cheered.

The Danish Minister, M. de Fulbe, expressed the gratitude of his countrymen, from the palace to the cottage, from the king to the peasant, to Captain Murrell and his brave crew.

Gen. New, the American Consul, added words of welcome, and the Lord Mayor explained that the American Minister would have been present, but until he was presented to the Queen he had no official status.

Gen. New said the appreciation of true heroism was common to the people of all climes, and especially to the people of Old England, America, and perhaps in no less degree of the people of Denmark. Captain Murrell's action would stand out conspicuous as a great effort of true seamanship and gallantry. Gen. New then gave the popular commander cheques for $2,500, and Capt. Murrell, having broken the fastening of the sealed letter, the Lord Mayor read a letter from the Chancellor of the German Empire highly eulogizing Capt. Murrell, after which the proceedings terminated.

THE SAMOAN DISPUTE.

Protocol Drafted Dealing With the Questions at Issue.

A Berlin cable says: Sir Edward Malet, Mr. Kasson and Herr Holstein, as a Committee of Revision, completed to-day a draft of a protocol concerning Samoan questions. It contains clauses relating to the municipal government of Apia, the coaling ports held by the Powers, the Land Commission and the autonomy of the Samoan Government, the text of which has already been cabled to Washington and approved by Mr. Blaine. The remaining clauses, defining the tariff of Samoa, the Constitution of the native Government, and the limitation of the German claims for indemnity from the natives, have been framed in consonance with instructions from Mr. Blaine, who is in daily cable contact with the Commission. Nothing, therefore, ought, in the opinion of the delegates, to prevent the winding up of the Conference on Tuesday, when the business is expected to be limited to the exchange of signature agreements.

He Would Not Refuse.

"Let us not waste our time," yelled the temperance lecturer, "let us not waste our time in dealing with the small saloons and grogshops. Let us go to the fountain-head. Let us go to the brewery, my friends."

"All right," chimed in an old soaker from a back seat. "I'm with you."—America.

OVER AN EMBANKMENT.

Forty-five Passengers Hurt in a Railway Accident

ON THE ST. LOUIS & SAN FRANCISCO.

A last (Friday) night's St. Louis despatch says: The west-bound train on the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad, which left St. Louis last night at 8.15, was wrecked three miles from Sullivan, Mo. Not a passenger escaped unhurt, and 45 are known to have been seriously injured, though no deaths are reported. The train was running at a high rate of speed when suddenly, without warning, the track gave way and the locomotive, baggage car and five coaches went over the embankment. The trainmen and those who were only slightly injured at once set to work to prevent the additional horror of fire, in which they succeeded. They then turned their attention to the more unfortunate injured and in a short time 45 passengers, all badly hurt, had been released from the debris. A temporary hospital was improvised at Sullivan, and the most seriously injured were taken there, while others were brought to St. Louis on the relief train, which was hurried to the scene of disaster. It was 11.25 when the accident occurred. The train was travelling at high speed, and most of the passengers had already gone to sleep, while the few remaining awake were about to do so. There is a curve in the road three miles west of Sullivan, and when that point was reached a sudden jolt and jar was felt all over the train, and people in the rear cars could hear the forward coaches rattling over the ties and the crushing noises of cars being demolished. A creek is crossed by the road at that point and there is a steep embankment thirty feet high. Most of the passengers thought the train was going through a bridge, and a feeling of horror chilled their blood. In an instant all the coaches except the two sleeping cars had been thrown from the rails. People were thrown about in the cars in all directions, and some of them were thrown through the windows and down the embankment.

The train proper was made up of a mail car, an express car, baggage car, a smoker, a ladies' coach, a reclining chair car and two Pullman sleepers. Back of these sleepers were hitched five empty coaches, which had been picked up at a way station. The front truck of the first sleeper jumped the track, but the rest of the car remained and the rear sleeper and empty coaches behind it never left the track. Fortunately, there was no fire in the cars and the jolt extinguished the lights immediately. The explanation given of the accident by the trainmen was that the spikes and fishplates had been removed from the rails at the curve, just leaving the rail loose on the ties. The forward portion of the locomotive passed the place all right, but the tender jumped the track and was thrown part of the way down the embankment. Who removed the spikes and plates is not known, but the supposition is that it was the work of train robbers. The railroad officials claim it is a clear case of train wrecking. On the train was a large body of physicians returning from Springfield, where the National Convention is being held, and they rendered valuable assistance in caring for the injured.

"I AM NOT DEAD!"

Exclaimed a Young Lady an Hour Before the Time Set for Her Burial.

A Boston despatch says: "I am not dead!" That was the murmured exclamation which came to-day from the lips of Miss Kate Patten, the pretty young daughter of Enos Patten, of No. 14 Oak Grove terrace, yesterday afternoon. Sure enough, Miss Patten was not dead, though if she hadn't said so herself just then an undertaker would have been at work on her in the course of an hour. She had been sick since Thursday. The family physician said her disease was diphtheria, and a colleague whom he had called in agreed with him. Both had pronounced life extinct and were turning to leave the room when they were startled by the voice from the bed. They returned, and the fair sufferer was made as comfortable as possible and the physicians took their leave for the night. A few hours later they were again summoned to her bedside and she was again pronounced dead. This time there could be no mistake. The heart was silent, the jaw had fallen and there could be no rallying. But contrary, however, to the expectations of the doctors, and without any assistance from them (for they considered it entirely useless), Miss Patten an hour later completely revived and emerged from her trance-like sleep as before, only in a more pronounced manner. She became talkative and showed every desire to tarry in this world a while longer. Miss Patten had charge before her illness of the restaurant in the Park Square Railroad station, and if no unfavorable symptoms appear she will probably be back to work before many days.

Killed on the Railway Track.

A Montreal despatch says: Shortly after 10 yesterday morning a Canadian Pacific Railway ballast train was coming into Montreal, and when near the new lacrosse grounds at Green avenue, Cote St. Antoine, three of the men jumped off while the train was still travelling in order to save themselves a long walk back from the city. Two of them alighted without injury, but the third, a young Frenchman named Joseph Fournier, 22 years of age, alighted on a heap of ballast gravel by the side of the second line of metals, and rolled over and over into the middle of the other track. At that moment an inward passenger train came along and ran over the poor fellow before he could escape. The train passed over his thighs, which were severed almost at the hip joints, and the bottom part of his stomach was completely torn away. Notwithstanding his terrible injuries, he lived to be taken to the General Hospital, but expired almost immediately upon admission in great agony. The unfortunate man was a native of Quebec, and bore a good character. He had only started work on Saturday last.

THE CHICAGO MYSTERY.

Dr. Cronin's Body Found Last Evening in a Sewer.

GREAT EXCITEMENT IN CHICAGO.

A last (Wednesday) night's Chicago despatch says: The dead body of Dr. P. H. Cronin, the Irish American who strangely disappeared from his home in Chicago two weeks ago, was found this evening some distance north of the city in a sewer on Evanston avenue. A bloody towel was wrapped about the head. The rest of the body was stark naked. A Catholic emblem which the doctor wore next his skin, suspended at his neck, was untouched. On the dead man's head were a dozen deep cuts, which had severed the scalp and indented the skull. It is the opinion of the police that Cronin was murdered by some man who could not bring himself to disturb a Catholic trinket. Laborers in the employ of the Lakeview suburban Government have been cleaning the ditches along Evanston avenue during the week. To-day as they neared a catch basin they noticed a strong smell of putrifying flesh, and pried off the top of the basin and uncovered the body. It had apparently been hastily pitched into the basin, for the head was underneath and the feet and legs were up in the opening. The place where the corpse was discovered is about three hundred yards from the station of the Chicago & Evanston branch of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad. It is but two or three blocks from the lake and nearly a mile north of where the blood-stained trunk was found the day after Cronin's disappearance. It seems remarkable that it was not sooner discovered, for the Lakeview police started to search all the catchbasins in the suburb the week after the trunk was found. Old Maxwell, of Lakeview, who was one of the searching committee, said the searchers worked five or six days, but stopped a few blocks from the basin in which the body was found. The body was taken to the morgue and Cronin's friends were notified, and before midnight at least forty of them had identified the body. Among these were Dr. Brandt, President of the Cook County Hospital staff, and Cronin's dentist. Dr. Brandt's examination showed over the left temple a cut over four inches long through the scalp, and into the skull over the left pinnacle bone a cut one and a half inches long, which also marked the skull; also a cut one and a half inches long over the frontal bone and at the junction of the left parietal a cut three inches long. A great hubbub was caused in the suburb over the finding of the corpse. The police had hard work to keep back the crowd who tried to enter the morgue to see the remains. The tumult continued far into the night. Woodruff, or Black, the prisoner, who confessed to having helped carry off a trunk containing a corpse from a barn the night of Cronin's disappearance, manifested no discomposure when told that the body of Cronin was found. He talked freely, but would not go outside the story he originally told.

A DEACON'S ELOPEMENT.

The Old Fellow Skips Out With a Pretty Young Lady Bookkeeper and Comes to Canada.

A Hartford, Conn., despatch says: Canada has afforded refuge for another enterprising citizen of the great Republic. This time it is a highly respectable citizen of advanced age, a deacon of the Congregational Church, and his pretty but unscrupulous lady bookkeeper. Winter and Spring have gone off together, to the scandal of the entire good State of Connecticut. Deacon Asher P. Smith resided in Lebanon, and did the largest general produce business in the State, his daily receipts of flour averaging from four to five carloads. He is the father of a large family, and is also a grandfather, being 70 years of age. He is a brother of the noted Roswell P. Smith, of the Century Magazine Company, New York, a millionaire. Deacon Smith two years ago took into his employ, as assistant cashier, Miss Josephine King, a pretty brunette, aged 21 years. She proved herself such an excellent hand at figures that she was made confidential bookkeeper. Their relations soon began to attract attention. Miss King's people were most respectable, but she seemed determined to completely captivate her aged employer, and succeeded. They were finally discovered in a rather embarrassing situation, which led to the pair taking flight to avoid ridicule. Mr. Smith called in all the payments he could, mortgaged everything, and, after borrowing a large sum, started a few days since for Montreal, in the vicinity of which he and his paramour are now located. He took away with him a large sum of money, the extent of which has not yet been discovered. His son has assumed charge of the deserted business and promises all the victimized creditors full settlement, with interest, inside a year. Deacon Smith's action has nearly broken his old wife's heart.

Killed His Child.

A Windsor despatch says: A great deal of excitement is caused in the township of Maidstone by the trial of William Johnson, colored, for the murder of May, his 2-year-old step-daughter. On Wednesday Coroner Langlois opened the investigation by calling Hester Johnson, the wife of the prisoner. She testified that her husband treated her with great cruelty, frequently beat her into insensibility, and took a fiendish delight in dragging her about by the hair of her head. On a recent occasion he took the child by the neck and pounded her head against a fence. The child never recovered consciousness. James Lee, jun., saw the prisoner ill-treat the child by striking her head repeatedly against the fence. Dr. Coventry, who performed a post-mortem, testified that the child's death was caused by blows on the head. The jury brought in a verdict of guilty, and Johnson was brought here and lodged in jail, to stand his trial at the Fall Assizes.

A Hint About Bridal Presents.

"It is scarcely the right thing," said a young bride, "to look a gift horse in the mouth; and yet it is hard not to speak one's mind on a matter of this kind. It does seem to me that people might think a while before buying wedding presents. I am sure if they had done so I should not have received nine biscuit-boxes. What am I to do with them all? I can only use one at a time, or at the most, two. Now, what is to be done with the other seven? It's too perplexing. If I could only show them it wouldn't be so bad; but I can't even do that."

"Dear me! I don't know why you should worry over such a little thing as that," observed her sister, who had been married nine years. "Those extra biscuit-boxes will be very useful by-and-by. Select the one or two you want to keep, and then put the others carefully away. Whenever any of your friends marry, let a biscuit-box be your gift. It'll save you lots of money. When I was married I received six fish-servers among my presents. I was cross until some one gave me the hint that I have just given you, and then I was happy. It wasn't long before I had made good use of the five fish-servers.

Women's Heads and Waists.

The Venus de Medici's head measures around the temples 20½ inches; allow for the wavy hair a half inch and call it 20 inches. I make the waist 27 inches, but as the figure is bending slightly forward it may vary, according as the measure is applied. The neck is 13 inches. A lady friend was so kind as to measure several other ladies for my benefit, continues the Art Student, and I do not find such a marked difference. The heads are generally larger and the waists smaller, it is true, but take one instance: Head, 21½ inches; waist, 24½ inches; neck, 12½ inches. A young girl of 16 measures 21½ inches head and 24½ inches waist. Another lady measured just 20½ inches head. The measures were taken over the waist of the tunic. One would suppose the measures would be less if taken after the classical manner, but by some mysterious dispensation of Providence the waist of the modern woman is acknowledged to measure more when untrammeled.

The waists of English actresses have been measured by the Stage, with the following results: Ellen Terry has one of the largests waists—38 inches. Mary Anderson's waist a few years ago was 24½ inches, now it is 26 inches. One of her favorite shades in dress is green; she likes soft, clinging Liberty silks. She always wears her hair very loose. Miss Eastlake has a 28-inch waist. Her soft, fluffy hair and the soft, easy-going silk gowns she wears give her a rather untidy appearance. Mrs. Bernard Beers doesn't wear stays, and has a waist 27 inches. Dorothy Dene's waist is 24 inches. Mary Rorke has a 23-inch waist. Kate Vaughan has the smallest on the stage. It measures 21½ inches. Mary Moore's waist is 23 inches. Miss Norreys has a 22-inch waist. Grace Hawthorne's waist is 25 inches.

Old Fashions Revived in Paris.

An antiquated fashion that is in process of revival is that of horizontal stripes (they used to be called bayadere some thirty years ago) in dress goods. People do not realize that this fashion dates from some six hundred years ago, when French and English royal ladies had the monopoly of certain splendid materials, then called baudekin, in that style. Sometimes the stripes were alternate bands of colored velvet and cloth of gold tissue. This fashion, like history, repeats itself. A new and very lovely color, called parchment, is the latest novelty. It is a charming shade of pale yellow or rather yellowish white, more tinged with yellow than ivory white. It is almost exactly the hue of very rich cream. The new anemone purple is nothing more or less than the pretty tint of lilac which has for years past been called Ophelia. There is talk of reviving still another old fashion, which is that of carrying costly handkerchiefs in lace or lace-trimmed embroidery to grand entertainments. Nowadays a point lace handkerchief forms as much a part of the wedding toilet of a Parisian bride as her ivory-bound prayer book, but is never seen at balls or dinner parties.

Her Engagement Ring.

Did you ever have a chance to observe, unobserved, a young woman's conduct toward her newly-acquired engagement ring? It seems so strange upon her hand that she cannot refrain from examining it a dozen times an hour, always, however, on the sly. On the first night she sits up an hour later than usual to admire it boldly in the seclusion of her own apartment. A frequent kiss is administered to the shining band and its glittering gem, and during the night she dreams that it has fallen into a stream, and awakes, clutching the finger to assure herself that the precious pledge is still secure.

Then, on the following day, she wears it only in secret, taking care to transfer it to her pocket at the table and when in the company of intimates. But place her among strangers, or among casual acquaintances who cannot be inquisitive, and how bravely will she flaunt the token before their eyes as one who should say:

"I may not be the loveliest creature in the world, but you will observe that I get there all the same."

Gradually it assumes its place in her daily life, and her blushes grow less violent with each succeeding explanation of its insignificance, and each extravagant description of its donor's attributes. But before it finally becomes a part of herself, as it were, she must, of course, leave it a dozen times at least upon the washstand, and suffer in consequence a dozen violent attacks of palpitation of the heart until it is recovered.

What Women are Doing.

Mrs. Harrison shocks Washington fashionables by carrying her own bundles just as any other sensible woman does.

Mrs. J. Redding, editor of the New York Art Journal, is one of the many women who ride the new English bicycle made for women.

One of the studies pursued by the young ladies of the Wisconsin University is carpentry. The students are said to gain proficiency in that department as rapidly as in the more intellectual studies in which they are engaged.

Countess Orcsy, of the Austrian nobility, lately inherited a fortune, and has spent part of it in erecting an enormous circus building at Vienna. She hopes to take her troup to the Paris exposition, and her peculiar fad is encouraged by friends who admire her originality and vigor. The countess is one of the finest horsewomen in Europe.

The State Teachers' Association of Iowa recently elected Miss Lottie Graham to the Presidency, the first woman to whom this honor has been given. Miss Graham was Superintendent of Public Schools in Page county, and at the end of her first term was re-elected by a large majority. She is a graduate of the Granville (O.) Female College.

A pretty fancy at a recent luncheon given by an American lady in London was that of marking the places of her guests by a single perfect rose upon a petal of which was delicately inscribed the name of the person to occupy the place. The writing was done by means of electricity, the effect of the electrical current being to take the color out of leaf, leaving a white line.

The much-talked-of Mississippi girl who bought calico and made a bonnet with the five cents given her for a birth-day present is, we it is said, likely to die a millionaire. She sold the bonnet, as related, for 40 cents and kept turning her capital over till it amounted to $40. This she put into a cow, whose milk she sold for $20, besides raising a calf worth as much, so now she has $60 worth of cattle and $20 cash as the result of a small beginning.

Women are beginning to abandon corsets, and it looks as though that article, like the bustle, must go. All over the country ladies are substituting the corded waists, which are said to be healthy and vastly more comfortable. Physicians say the change is a good one and the artists are enthusiastic over it. A charming dress for the woman who discards her whalebone armor is the "Tallien" gown. It falls in soft folds and conforms to the quaint effects which are so much sought in house toilets.

There are now some 9,000 women doctors in the United States—about one to each 33 of the masculine variety. Some of them have incomes exceeding $20,000 and very few fall below $1,000. They grow and thrive best in New York, Pennsylvania and Massachusetts. After that comes the far West. In the south they have never got a footing, and outside of Maryland and Virginia there is not one in the length and breadth of Dixieland. Only 3 per cent. of graduates forswear medicine for matrimony, and of these who do one-third marry other doctors.

Late Fashion Notes.

The Hading veil is disappearing.

Toques grow more pointed in front.

The tea gown bids fair to live forever.

Green remains the color most in vogue.

Spring willow is a lovely shade of golden green.

They are wearing hat crowns much lower just now.

Pompeiian blue looks royal and beautiful in velvets and plushes.

Round waists and belts are gradually displacing pointed bodices and basques.

Striped tennis gowns are frequently worn with striped Cowes caps to match them. So are beach gowns.

The yoke waists are now about as much worn by full grown women as they have been by children for the last two years.

The newest fabric for little girls' clothing is plaided mohair. It is light in texture and its color combinations are generally artistic.

Next in favor to green come shades of red-brown, dull brick, terra cotta and Egyptian red, which are seen in both dark and light shades.

Girdles of silver or bronze about an inch in width looped around the waist and with one end hanging down to the ankles are occasionally worn.

An evening costume recently seen at a Paris reception was of shot velvet, apparently of vieux rose and green, the combination making a dull helio trope.

A combination much worn this season is that of black and yellow. Black straw hats take yellow ribbons and flowers, and yellow straws have black ribbons and black feathers.

Thin materials for hot-weather wear are very fresh and charming, but very expensive. For the most part they are open-work tissues from India and cost quite as much as satin or velvet.

There is an extensive assortment of cotton dress fabrics for summer wear, including zephyrs, ginghams, embroidered French organdy muslin, Chambry batistes, lawns and crepons.

The most popular wrap just at present is one that partakes of the nature of both the jacket and the cape. It is a tight-fitting bodice without sleeves, over which a loose cape reaches to the waist.

The corsages of those gowns which are made of the costliest semi-diaphanous and transparent tissues have crossed surplices on the bosoms in empire style, belted or pointed waists, and airy scarfs that cross and tie in easy artistic folds.

There are any number of fancy wraps for this season's wear. There are corsage bodices with deep lace wings. Abbe Galant capes, empire mantles, Louis XV. coats, pelerines and pelisses of lace, and long lace Connemara cloaks, and ever so many more.

Fashion-makers say that the next freak in veils will be the large, long, blond lace ones in use about forty years ago. They were tied around the high crown of the Dunstable bonnet and thrown back, falling mantle-fashion over the shoulder to a point below the waist line.

HORE OF MRS. BOWSER'S TRIALS

Pathetic Stories of Two Tramps.

From the Detroit Free Press.

"What did that man want?" asked Mr. Bowser, as he came up to dinner the other day, just as a strange man left the door.

"He was a tramp," I replied.

"And you turned him away without even a crust!"

"Haven't you often told me to look out for those gentry? He looked like a hard case."

"He didn't look anything of the sort: The man appeared in ill-health, and it was a mean thing to turn him off in that way."

"Well, he's standing on the corner, and if you feel for him you can give him something."

"Oh, I can! How liberal you are! Well, I'm going to hand him a quarter, anyhow. No one knows what the poor fellow may have suffered. I'll let him wheel those ashes out of the yard, and give him a dollar for the job."

He beckoned the man into the alley and asked him if he wanted a job.

"What is it?" was the cautious reply.

"Wheeling out those ashes. You can do it in an hour, and I'll give you a dollar."

"I haven't come down to that yet, old man."

"But don't you want work?"

"Not that sort. I want a quarter to get a square meal."

"But you ought to be willing to work for it."

"Would you wheel anybody's ashes for any price? Not much, you old bloke! There's a ring of you fellows who have got us poor chaps by the neck, and you want to tread us into the earth. Don't try to stop me, old man!"

"I did feel for you at first, but now—"

"Oh, yes, you felt for me the same as a tiger does for an orphan baby. You wanted to get $5 worth of work for fifty cents. Go to grass, you old bond-holder!"

"Do you know who you are talking to?" demanded Mr. Bowser.

"No, and I don't care! Don't you give me any lip or I'll punch your head!"

Mr. Bowser started to pull off his coat, but the man hit him in the eye and knocked him against the fence, and then went off, saying that it was lucky for Mr. Bowser it didn't happen to be his well day.

"He couldn't have been a hard case, could he?" I queried, as I went out to Mr. Bowser.

He was holding his hand to his eye, and didn't reply.

"He appeared to me to be in ill-health," I softly continued. "Mr. Bowser, you have a heart of stone."

He didn't say a word until he had washed his eye in salt and water and eaten his dinner. Then, as he took his hat to go, he turned on me with:

"It was the way in which you treated his request that drove him to desperation, and it will be singular if he doesn't return and burn our barn! Mrs. Bowser, I've got to have a plain talk with you! This thing can't go much further!"

But it did. He got half the police force after the tramp, secured his arrest, and then had him sent up for three months.

One day a woman called and asked for aid and told a pitiful story of distress. I was asking for her street and number when Mr. Bowser came in.

"Do you mean to insult the woman?" he brusquely demanded as I wrote down the information.

"I am going to help her if she has told me a straight story."

"Straight! Do you think she has sat here and lied to you?"

"Heaven forbid!" exclaimed the woman, as she rolled her eyes to the ceiling.

"My good woman," said Mr. Bowser, as he turned to her, "you have no doubt spoken the truth. Any one can see that you are frail and delicate and greatly worried. Expect no sympathy from my wife. She'd demand a certificate of character from an angel. Here are a couple of dollars, and if you will call again I'll do something further."

"Heaven bless you, sir! You have a heart indeed!"

When she had gone Mr. Bowser said to me:

"You'd get your pay for such conduct, old lady! No wonder you are in such mortal terror of thunder storms!"

"I'll bet the woman is a fraud!" I hotly replied.

"That's a poor way to sneak out of it. I haven't a doubt every word she has spoken has been the solemn truth."

That afternoon I rode over to the street and number she had given me, but could see nothing of her. I made persistent inquiry for blocks around, but she was not to be heard of. I had just returned home when she came along and sat down on the front steps to wait for Mr. Bowser. I thought she acted rather singular, and when Mr. Bowser came up the suspicion was verified.

"Whoop! Hooray!" she shouted as he came near. "Shay, old man, you're a daisy!"

"W-what's this!" demanded Mr. Bowser, as he stopped short.

"Ole gal's zhrunk again—zhat's all!" she replied as she tried to throw her arms about him.

"Are you the—the woman who called here this forenoon?" he asked.

"You bez I am."

"And I gave you $2."

"Sho, you did, ole boy, and I've come back for two more! I'll bez on you every time, ole lily of the valley."

"Woman, did you spend any of that money for drink?" he demanded.

"Did I! Shertingly I did! Shay, ole man, zhere ain't no flies on you! Let me kiss you for your muzzer!"

"Go away, woman!"

"Who's go away, woman! Don't talk zat way to me! I'm muzzer of five lizzle children. I am, and they hain't got nuthing to eat or wear."

"I believe you are an impostor!"

"Whaz zat? Don't shass me, you ole reprobate, or I'll make it sad for you! I want $2 right away!"

He got by her and got into the house, probably hoping I hadn't seen or heard anything. But I said:

"Mr. Bowser, do you want to insult the woman?"

He didn't reply.

"I called at the address she gave, but no one in the neighborhood ever heard of her. However, I don't want to prejudice you against——"

"Her troubles have made her luny, I think," he interrupted.

"Poor thing! Then you will see about having her sent to an asylum?"

"Mrs. Bowser, will you keep still?" he exclaimed.

"But you said I was——"

"Or, must I leave this house to find peace and comfort?"

But next morning when I referred to the matter in an incidental way he put on a very innocent look and replied:

"What woman do you refer to? You must be losing your mind, Mrs. Bowser. Perhaps it would be well for you to take a week in the country this spring. I have noticed for some time past that your memory seems to be gradually getting away from you."

Queen Victoria's Keys.

Three hours later, as I said good night, my host stopped me. "There is something you would like to see, and it is just time. Come along." As we went along an officer of the guard rushed by in full uniform, sword ringing against the stone steps, huge bear-skin helmet and all the rest, and cried out to us: "You will be late if you don't hurry," and away he went at the double-quick across the moon-lit parade. It was rather soon after dinner for a constitutional, but we followed, and found the guard already turned out under the gallery by the Bloody Tower. A moment later appeared a little squad of men, one of them in a flowing scarlet robe, with a lighted lantern, coming up the steep slope that leads from Traitors' Gate. The sentry challenged sharply:

"Halt! Who goes there?"

The warder halts and answers:

"The keys."

"Whose keys?"

"Queen Victoria's keys."

"Pass, Queen Victoria's keys."

The warder in the flowing scarlet robe with the lighted lantern, followed with his little squad, starts off again, but halts again and cries aloud.

The guard comes to the present, the officer brings his sword to the salute, officer and men respond in chorus three times with a kind of cheer:

"Amen, amen, amen."

Again the warder sets out, passes, turns square to the left and vanishes, he and his flowing scarlet, and his lantern, and his little squad. He is carrying the keys of the Tower to the Governor of the Tower. It was but a minute. The guard was dismissed, the officer marched leisurely off. My friend and I are left there. Only a minute, yet that selfsame ceremony has been transacted on that same spot, at the same hour every night, for something like 800 years. Back through all those crowded centuries of English story you hear nightly that challenge ring out; nightly that blessing invoked on King or Queen, with, I suppose, an interval when Oliver Protector got the benefit of it, and nightly the clash of steel which tells the Constable of the Tower that "all is well."—From a London Letter.

The Champion Baby Farmer.

FOR ADOPTION—Lovely new born baby boy, full surrender. Mrs. Koehler, midwife, —th street.

A.—FOR ADOPTION lovely new-born baby girl, full surrender. Mrs. Koehler, —th street.

These advertisements appeared in a New York paper the other day, whereupon a World reporter visited the advertiser. Mrs. Koehler is a short, barrel shaped woman, with small features and a complexion like a green ham. She seemed to think her traffic in babies legitimate.

"How did you get the children?" asked the reporter.

"The mothers surrender them to me. They will have better success next time getting husbands."

"Will you take less than $2?"

"Well, you can have the two for $3, and then I have nothing for the car fare."

"Do you think the babies will live?"

"Sure."

"And such," commented the reporter, "is the irony of fate," and he might have added, the tar-and-feather meanness of people of the low-down Koehler stripe.

Braided lace has a rather inappropriate sound, but it really is very effective and pretty. The pattern of roses or other flowers is traced with the braid, and a raised effect is given by winding and twisting the braid about the blossoms and leaves in the design. This makes a very durable as well as effective trimming lace.

THE Brompton Hospital for Consumptives, London, Eng., published a statement that fifty-two (52) per cent. of the patients of that institution have unsuspected kidney disorder. Prof. Wm. H. Thompson, of the University of the City of New York, says: "More adults are carried off in this country by chronic kidney disease than by any other one malady except consumption." The late Dr. Dio Lewis, in speaking of Warner's Safe Cure, says over his own signature: "If I found myself the victim of a serious kidney trouble, I would use Warner's Safe Cure."

Laura Bridgman Dead.

Laura Bridgman died yesterday at the South Boston Asylum, where she had long dwelt. She was 60 years old and has been deaf and dumb and blind from her second year. She was made widely famous by Charles Dickens in his "American Notes," and also by many public references to her wonderful intelligence.

The greatest snuff-taking country in the world is France, though it shows a decline in the habit. In 1869 the consumption was 19,000,000 pounds, or seven ounces per head. Now it is five ounces.

"Boys Will Be Boys."

"Boys will be boys." We resent the old saying,
Current with men,
Let it be heard, in excuse for our straying,
Never again.
Ours is a hope that is higher and clearer,
Ours is a purpose far brighter and dearer,
Ours is a name that should silence the jeerer;
We will be men.

"Boys will be boys" is an unworthy slander;
Boys will be men!
The spirit of Philip in young Alexander
Kindled again.
As the years of our youth fly swiftly away,
As brightens about us the light of life's day,
As the glory of manhood dawns on us we say,
We will be men.

Boys will be boys." Yes, if boys may be pure
Models for men;
If their thoughts may be modest, their truthfulness sure,
Say it again.
If boys will be boys such as boys ought to be—
Boys full of sweet-minded, light-hearted glee—
Let boys be boys, brave, loving and free,
Till they are men.

Consumption Curable.

It cannot be too often impressed on every one that the much dreaded consumption (which is only lung scrofula) is curable, if attended to at once, and that the primary symptoms, so often mistaken as signs of diseased lungs, are only symptoms of an unhealthy liver. To this organ the system is indebted for pure blood, and to pure blood the lungs are indebted no less than to pure air for healthy action. If the former is polluted, we have the hacking cough, the hectic flush, night sweats and a whole train of symptoms resembling consumption. Rouse the liver to healthy action by the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, take healthy exercise, live in the open air, and all symptoms of consumption will disappear. For weak lungs, spitting of blood, shortness of breath, chronic nasal catarrh, bronchitis, asthma, severe coughs and kindred affections it is a most wonderful remedy. The "Discovery" is guaranteed to cure in all cases of diseases for which it is recommended, or money paid for it will be promptly refunded.

They Pay $500, or Cure.

For many years the manufacturers of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, who are thoroughly responsible financially, have offered in good faith, through nearly every newspaper in the land, a standing reward of $500 for a case of nasal catarrh, no matter how bad, or of how long standing, which they cannot cure. The Remedy is sold by druggists at only 50 cents. It is mild, soothing, cleansing, deodorizing, antiseptic and healing.

The Shoe & Leather Reporter, N. Y., and Shoe & Leather Review, Chicago, the leading trade papers of the U.S. in the Hide line, have sent their representatives to investigate Mr. Page's business, and after a thorough examination and comparison the Reporter gives him this endorsement:

We believe that in extent of light-weight raw material collected and carried, Mr. Page holds the lead of any competitor and that his present stock is the largest held by any house in this country.

And the Review says:

After a most thorough investigation of Mr. Page's business as compared with others in same line, we have become fully satisfied that he is especially light-weight stock, he is unquestionably the largest dealer in this country, while in superiority of quality he is conceded at the head.

QUERY: If Mr. Page's business is the largest in its line in the United States, is it not the best possible proof of his ability to pay highest prices? If he did not do so, would he naturally get more Skins than any of his competitors in the same line?

Balsam Valley Items.

From our own Corresponde nt.

As I gaze upon the changed personal appearance of our progressive farmers, it strikes me very forcibly that they have already reached the second stage of evolution. When they commenced seeding a little over a month ago, literally covered with heavy woollen clothing, and supporting themselves on the handles of the plow, they reminded me of some hibernating animal just awakned out of its long winter nap but as the warm weather set in, they gradually disposed of their outside covering—hats, felt boots, and large flannel pants and various other under apparel too numerous to mention. But now you see them, not working after the plow or harrow, but in a far more exalted position on their land rollers, dressed up in extremely good fitting, tailor-made clothes and laced shoes and broad rimmed straw hats, pocket handkerchief and a maple limb well covered with leaves to brush off the mosquitoes. But on Sunday the contrast is more discernible as they wend their way to Sunday school or to church, with their new suits, felt hats and slippers. Oh yes, there is a very marked change come over our farmers during the past month. If they continue to develop with such rapid strides, I imagine it will not be long until they become possessed of flying faculties, and then they will soar to mansions high. I will not say anything about the ladies' apparel, for fear they might think I wanted to criticise their—dress improvers—and I would not like to fall out with them for they generally speak well of Oben

A certain pedagogue who has a situation out in the country not twenty miles from here, found it necessary to go to town after his day's work was through, to transact some private business of his own, and having great faith in his pedestrian abilities, he undertook the journey on foot. Accordingly he set out to perform his mission, and fell in with a little boy of whom he enquired the nearest road. The little boy wore a cool sarcastic smile as he answered the question, very favorable to the enquirer, and stuck his corn-sleeve in his mouth to prevent him chuckling as he watched the traveller proceed as directed. Over hills and through bush, and falling over logs and brush piles, foot sore and weary he at length reached his place of destination and many were the evil thoughts that passed through his mind in regard to that boy.

In this neighborhood, Mr Wm Sucket and Mary Jane M Lean were united in the bonds of matrimony about three weeks ago. The ceremony took place at the residence of Rev Mr Morrison who officiated. After the knot was tied the happy couple indulged in a buggy ride. Not knowing any more of the particulars I will conclude by wishing them long life and prosperity. I wonder who will be next?

The 24th of May is past, and most of our young folks went some place to enjoy themselves. Some of them went to Hopeville, but the majority of them went to the picnic at S. S. No. 13 and had a very good time. Three of our young men participated in the games, which consisted of jumping, vaulting and foot races. Running, hop, step and jump, T. Legate took 1st and W. Blakeston 2nd. Putting the stone, J. McMillan 1st, D. McDougal 2nd; standing long jump, T. Legate 1st, W. Hasty 2nd; vaulting, W. Sucket 1st, S. Blakeston 2nd; standing high jump, W. Sucket 1st, T. Legate 2nd; hundred yard race, W. Blakeston 1st S. Blakeston 2nd; 3 hundred yard race W. Blakeston 1st, J. Ferguson 2nd; obstacle race, W. Blakeston 1st, S. Blakeston 2nd. After they got through with the above proceedings, they went into the school house to listen to the entertainment which consisted of recitations, dialogues, remarks, music by the string band, dancing by I. H. Campbell and Miss Catharine Campbell, singing by the choir. The house was filled to its utmost capacity, and much praise is due to Mr Cowan and Mr Setter for the able manner in which they got up the program.

Still they come. We congratulate Mr J. Campbell on an addition to his family. Also Mr D. Ferguson. Does a plough, boy, and Douglas is a junk mad, but the both are very fond of milk. All our horses are doing well.

Miss Sarah J. Ferguson has returned from Toronto. We are glad to see her in our midst once more. A neighboring pedagogue paid B. Vanvalkenburg a short time ago. Mr McLaughlin of Harriston, was visiting at Mr. D. McCormick's. Miss Mary A. McMillan was visiting friends in this part. She contemplates going to Toronto for a few months. Half of Mr George Haw's oxen died some time ago from "moller orn". Mr Irvin Hay have also lost a fine steer. A cross sheep killed it with its head.

Mr A Ferguson was laid up for a few days with a sore back.

Mr W Stuart is getting his timber and lumber and everything on the ground preparatory to building a fine new stable.

Mr D Ferguson has bought quite a number of lambs throughout the country from $2 to $3.15. Mr Ryan of Rob Roy has bought the most in this neighborhood for $3.25. Opposition is the life of trade.

Mr A McLean and L T Nelson have disposed of some of their fat cattle to the drovers. The latter threatens to pound some of his neighbor's cattle for walking out of his pasture. Pound them with a stick Jim.

Mr H Lamont is thinking of going up the lakes to fish. We will hear some big fish stories when he returns.

By the appearance of things at the picnic the other day I think the next wedding I will chronicle will be from Balsam Valley.

Mr Peter McDonald was going to live with his parents in Glenelg. He formerly lived with his grandparents here.

Well Mr Editor, something seems to tell me day by day that my mental capacity stands greatly in need of a rest. For a long time I have resisted it considering it only imaginary, but of late I have decided to submit to the outbreaties of this supernatural apparation, for such it seems to be so I take this opportunity of letting you know my intentions, trusting it will meet your approval. You may hear from me again in two weeks but then I think I will stop until after hay est, when I will commence again, health and news permitting. OBEN.

The Dominion Parliament's railway debate is getting along very nicely—for us. Two weeks ago we made several very stiff charges against Mr. Hall. Last week his paper contained a column and a quarter of personal ridicule, but not a solitary one of our charges were answered [illegible] even referred to. We accused him of (1) of withholding the fact that the tariff on certain articles was lowered at the same time it was raised on others. (2) Of being actuated by a personal animus towards the railway company. (3) We asked him for the fourth time what politics have to do with the question. Not one of these things does he dare pass an opinion upon, but resorts to the refuge of a school boy by trying to talk smart and withdrawing public attention from the main issue. His smart-alecism does not ruffle our feelings one jot. That "Co-Boss" recitation, as he designates it, reminds us forcibly of a sermon of Mr. Hall's which a gentleman described to us the other day. It was not a "finished" effort, you know; kind of premature, eh, Theophilus? And then the straits the little man must have been put to when he would resort to such tactics! Did you ever see an angle worm under a magnifying glass? Well, he has crawled under one and now invites the public to "look at my size" while he squirms. Bah!

You say, Mr. Hall, that "we told a positive fact when we said he attempted to buy the Herald and couldn't get it." You told a positive lie, and we defy you to prove your statement. This was your assertion as published two weeks ago: "He did his level best to buy the Herald, and couldn't get it. Then the present proprietor came along and bought it. You see now why he vents his venom at the Herald." You give one half of our reply and leave a wrong impression on our readers. But then we should know you too well now to expect anything in the shape of veracity or British fair play from you. You are not acquainted with the significance of either of those terms. However, we challenge you to produce our reply to that low-bred shot. We also challenge you to inform your readers that you, when you were desirous of buying the Herald, called upon us in our office and asked assistance in securing that paper from Mr. Spurr. You forgot all about that, did you not, Theophilus? Or was it because you did not receive the encouragement you asked that you have lowered this discussion into a personal rut where you might be at home in your native mud-throwing element?

There was one more little thing in Theophilus' editorial which we will refer to and then be done with personalities. This is it: "One of our compositors suggests that Mr. T. sling rats to the tune of Co-boss. He will know what is meant." We know, most assuredly, what is meant by the odious title of "rats," but probably not so well as Mr. Hall. Our long identification with Toronto Typographical Union, No. 91—7 years—would not leave us in darkness as to the significance of the term. In fact we have heard it applied to Mr. Hall since coming to Flesherton—when he took the printing of 1200 copies of county council minutes at 6c cents per page, for instance, when the lowest living price was $1.10! Don't talk rats, Mr. Limpit, or you will get yourself into another mess. A little shrivelled-souled individual like you don't know what honor among men is. If you desire it we will send you a copy of the "Craftsman," the union printer's guide, and let you learn what all staunch union men think of such animals as you. It would be a good idea for you and your "compositor" to go and softly plunge your heads in the ink barrel and keep them there until the ink soaks all through the cavity where your brains should be. The ink would be much better than nothing.

A revolution is likely to be worked in steam navigation during the next few years. A New York man has conceived the idea of propelling a vessel by a small jet of water forced from the stern under immense pressure. Experiments have been highly satisfactory, and a vessel 100 feet long is now being built to practically test the new principle. The company building this vessel expect to attain a speed of from 30 to 40 miles an hour.

The spring of 1889 will long be remembered as one of great catastrophes. The very atmospheric results of an abnormal nature. Within the past few weeks there has been at least three railway accidents in Canada in which lives were lost, one of them almost equal in horror to the Des Jardines catastrophe of 32 years ago. The Johnstown horror has not yet been recovered from, nor will its shuddering details soon be forgotten. Last week the large city of Seattle, W.T., was swept off the face of the earth by a conflagration—150 acres left a barren, smoking desert and thousands left homeless and destitute, but fortunatlev the fire was accompanied by no great loss of life. Surely this chapter of calamities is sufficient to cause this springtime to be remembered in after years as the spring of woes. Rains, floods, fire and fate have been busily at work with a grim success that makes one gravely pause in contemplation thereof.

Maxwell

From our own Correspondent.

The weather proved fine for the garden party, but owing to the dampness of the ground the crowd was not as large as it would have been. The band gave some excellent music. Mr. C. J. Sproule entertained the people with his violin as well as the organ. Albert Heron and his mouth organ were well in the foreground also. On leaving, the band were asked by a gentleman (he does not live in Maxwell) if they would come again next year and play for him. He was not refused, either, so George will be expecting all of the band next year. The proceeds amounted to $30.

From our own Correspondent.

The rain has been falling almost incessantly for the past few days. Farmers say the land is so very wet that it is almost an impossibility to do anything in the way of cultivating. So much rain has not been known, at this season of the year, for some time. The Beaver river is overflowing its banks, and fields of grain are covered with water. The rain have been getting a rest for the past week.

M.R. Hammond, Esq., received a telegram last week from friends in the state of Pennsylvania, stating they were all safe from the recent storm and flood in Johnstown, and other towns in that vicinity.

Kimberley is to have preaching every Sunday from this time forward, by the travelling minister. Once in two weeks in the morning and once in two weeks in the evening.

FIFTEEN HUNDRED PERSONS

Perish in the Floods Which Wipe Out Two Villages.

JOHNSTOWN, PA., WASHED AWAY

Appalling Sights, Thrilling Rescues and Dreadful Deaths.

A VERITABLE RIVER OF DEATH.

Disasters by the Floods in Other Parts of Pennsylvania.

Houses by the Dozens Floating Down Stream With Living Freights.

A last (Friday) night's Pittsburg despatch says: A sudden freshet is reported in the North Fork River, east of Johnstown, in the Alleghany Mountains. Two-thirds of Johnstown is said to be under water and the railroad and telegraph lines are washed out. Pittsburg has had no wire communication with Johnstown for three hours.

LATER.—The flood at Johnstown has resulted in an awful catastrophe. It is said the reservoir above the town broke about 5 o'clock this evening and the immense volume of water rushed down to the city, carrying with it death and destruction. Houses with their occupants were swept away, and scores, probably hundreds, were drowned. There is no communication with Johnstown, but a telegraph operator in the Pennsylvania Railway tower at Sag Hollow, twelve miles this side of Johnstown, says at least seventy-five dead bodies have floated past. The wires are all down, and no trains are running east of Blairsville, which is about twenty-five miles west of Johnstown. There is no way to get to the scene of the disaster, and full particulars can hardly be obtained to-night, although every effort is being made to do so.

The latest reliable information received from Johnstown comes through Pennsylvania railroad officials, who aver that over 200 dead bodies have been counted floating down stream at Johnstown alone.

A special from Greenburg says a report has reached here that the greater portion of Johnstown has been flooded and hundreds of lives have been lost. Houses are floating about and the people who are free are panic-stricken and are fleeing to the mountains. At a point near New Florence eighty-five persons have been seen floating down the river on drift-wood. A report comes that but two roofs of the houses in Johnstown can be seen. The Cove Town and New Florence bridges have been washed away and all the buildings along the Covemaugh, between New Florence and Johnstown, have been carried away. The railroad towers have been abandoned by the operators.

Another special from Greensburg says Johnstown is completely submerged, and the loss of life is inestimable. Houses are going down the river by the dozen, and people can be seen clinging to the roofs. At Coketown, a village of several hundred inhabitants, the houses are almost entirely covered, and a great many dwellings at Blairsville are submerged. Scarcely a dwelling in the vicinity of Snag Hollow can be seen.

A despatch from Latrobe says: The Association Press train, from present appearances, will not be run nearer than six or eight miles of that part of Johnstown where the flood was worst.

A despatch from Braddock says: The telegraph wires being down absolutely for six or seven miles below the immediate scene of the disaster, and being in unworkable shape for three or four miles' distance, it was half-past 7 before an accurate outline of the effect of the tidal wave could be learned. The chief officials of the Pittsburg end of the main line of the Pennsylvanian Railroad received most of their first information from the signal tower at Snag Hollow, six miles west of Johnstown. At a quarter of 8 o'clock a boy was rescued by a man in the signal tower. He said that with his father, mother, brother and two sisters he was swept away in the tight frame house which was their home. He was washed away from the building, but said the other members of the family were in it when it was swept over the breast of the Newstone railroad bridge at Johnstown, that it capsized a few seconds later and they were all drowned so far as he could see. The railroad operator officially reports that before dark they were able to count 119 persons clinging to buildings, wreckage or drowned and floating in the current. If this is correct the damage in the town proper must be in the nature of a clean sweep. As early as 1 o'clock the alarm was sent to Johnstown that there was danger from the dam. The railroad officials were notified and in a very short time began to carry people from the town to places of safety.

A TERRIBLE SCENE.

Disaster overtook Johnstown about 6 o'clock last evening. As the train bearing the special correspondents sped eastward the reports at each stop grew more appalling. At Derry a group of railway officials were gathered who had come from Bolivar, the end of the passable portion of the road westward. They had seen but a small portion of the awful scene but enough to allow them to imagine the rest. Down through the Packsadale came the rushing waters. The heights of the Alleghenies look down in solemn wonder at the scene of the most terrible destruction that ever struck the romantic valley of the Conemaugh. The water was rising, when the men left at 6 o'clock, at the rate of five feet an hour. Clinging to improvised rafts, constructed in the death battle from floating boards and timbers, were agonized men, women and children, their heart-rending shrieks for help striking horror to the breasts of the onlookers. Their cries were of no avail. Carried along at railway speed on the breast of the rushing torrent no human ingenuity could devise a means of rescue. With pale cheek and hair clinging wet and damp to her cheek a mother was grasping a floating timber, and in her other arm she held

HER BABE, ALREADY DROWNED.

With a death grip on a plank a strong man, just giving up hope, cast an imploring look to those on the bank. An instant later and he had sunk into the waves. Prayers to their God, cries to those in safety rang above the roaring waves. The special train pulled in at Bolivar at 11.30 p.m., and the trainmen were there notified that further progress was impossible. The greatest excitement prevailed at this place, and parties of citizens are out all the time endeavoring to save the poor unfortunates that are being hurled into eternity on the rushing torrent. The tidal wave struck Bolivar just after dark, and in five minutes the Conemaugh rose from six to forty feet and the waters spread over the whole country. Soon houses began floating down, and clinging to the debris were men, women and children, shrieking for aid. A large number of citizens at once gathered at the county bridge, and they were reinforced by a number from Garfield, a town on the opposite side of the river. They brought a number of ropes, and these were thrown over into the boiling waters as persons drifted by, in efforts to save some poor beings. For half an hour all efforts were fruitless, until at last, when the rescuers were about giving up all hope, a little boy astride a shingle roof managed to catch hold of one of the ropes. He caught it under his left arm and was thrown violently against an abutment, but managed to keep hold and was successfully pulled on to the bridge amid the cheers of the onlookers. His name was Hessler, and his rescuer was a train hand named Carney. The lad was at once taken to the town of Garfield and cared for. The boy was about 16 years old.

HIS STORY OF THE CALAMITY

is as follows: With my father I was spending the day at my grandfather's house in Cambria City. In the house at the time were Theodore, Edward and John Kintz and John Kintz, jun., Miss Mary Kintz, Mrs. Mary Kintz, wife of John Kintz, jun., Miss Treacy Kintz, Mrs. Rica Smith, John Hirsch and four children, my father and myself. Shortly after 5 o'clock there was a noise of roaring waters and screams of people. We looked out the door and saw persons running. My father told us never to mind as the waters would not rise further, but soon we saw houses being swept away, and then we ran up to the floor above. The house was three stories, and we were at last forced to the top one. In my fright I jumped on the bed. It was an old-fashioned one, with heavy posts. The water kept rising and my bed was soon afloat. Gradually it was lifted up. The air in the room grew close and the house was moving. Still the bed kept rising and pressed the ceiling. At last the posts pushed the plaster. It yielded and a section of the roof gave away, then suddenly I found myself on the roof and was being carried down stream. After a little this roof commenced to part and I was afraid I was going to be drowned, but just then another house with a shingle roof floated by, and I managed to crawl on it and floated down until nearly dead with cold, when I was saved. After I was freed from the house I did not see my father. My grandfather was on a tree, but he must have been drowned, as the waters were rising fast. John Kintz, jun., was also on a tree. Miss Mary Kintz and Mrs. Mary Kintz I saw drown. Miss Smith was also drowned. John Hirsch was in a tree. The four children were drowned. The scene was terrible. Live bodies and corpses were floating down with me and away from me. I would see a person; there would be a shriek, and then they would disappear. All along the line were people who were trying to save us, but they could do nothing, and only a few were caught. This boy's story shows what happened to one family.

GOD ONLY KNOWS

what has happened to the hundreds who were in the patter of the rushing waters. At the lower bridge, which crosses the Conemaugh at Bolivar, a young man and two women were seen coming down the river on part of a floor. At the upper bridge a rope was thrown to them, but this they failed to catch. Between the two bridges the young man was noticed to point towards the elder woman, who, it is supposed, was his mother. He was then seen to instruct the woman how to catch the rope which was being lowered from the other bridge. Down came the raft with a rush. The brave man stood with his arms around the two women as they swept under the bridge. He reached up and seized the rope. He was jerked violently away from the two women, who failed to get a hold on the rope. Seeing that they would not be rescued, he dropped the rope and fell back on the raft, which floated on down the river. The current washed the frail craft in towards the bank, and the young man was enabled to seize hold of the branch of a tree. The man aided the two women to get up into the tree. He held on with his hands and rested his feet on a pile of driftwood. A piece of floating debris struck the drift, sweeping it away. The man hung with his body under the water. A pile of drift soon collected, and he was enabled to get another insecure footing. Up the river there was a sudden crash, and a section of the bridge was swept away and floated down the stream, striking the tree and washing it away. All three were thrown into the water and were drowned.

Rescuing parties are being formed in all towns along the railroad. Houses have been thrown open to the refugees and every possible means is being used to protect the homeless. The wrecking trains of the Pennsylvania Railroad are slowly making their way east to the unfortunate citizens.

WHAT AN OPERATOR SAW.

Harry Fisher, a young telegraph operator, who was at Bolivar when the first rush began, says he knew nothing of the disaster until he noticed the river slowly rising and then more rapidly. News then reached us from Johnstown that the dam at Southforks had burst. Within three hours the water in the river rose twenty feet. Shortly before 6 o'clock ruins of houses, household utensils, barrels and kegs came floating past the bridges. At 8 o'clock the water was within six feet of the roadbed of the bridge. The wreckage floated past without stopping for at least two hours. Then it began to lessen, and night coming suddenly upon us we could see no more. The wreckage was floating by for a long time before the first living person passed. Fifteen persons that I saw were carried down by the river. One of these, a boy, was saved, and three of them were drowned just below the town.

IT WAS AN AWFUL SIGHT,

and one that I will not soon forget. Hundreds of animals were lost. The bodies of horses, dogs and chickens floated past. The little boy who was rescued at Bolivar had two dogs as companions during his fearful ride. The dogs were drowned just before reaching the bridge. One old mule swam past. Its shoulders were torn, but it was alive when it went past the town.

THEY WERE AFRAID.

"We were afraid of the lake," said a gentleman who had lived in Johnstown for years. "We were afraid of that lake seven years ago. No one could see the immense height to which that artificial dam had been built without fearing the tremendous power of water behind it. The dam must have had a sheer height of 100 feet, thus forcing the water that high above its natural bed and making a lake at least three miles long and a mile wide out of what could scarcely be called a pond. I doubt if there is a man or woman in Johnstown who at some time or other had not feared and spoken of the terrible disaster that has now come. People wondered and asked why the dam was not strengthened, as it certainly had become weak, but nothing was done, and by and by they talked less about it, as nothing happened, though now and then some would shake their heads as if conscious the fearful day would come some time when their worst fears would be transcended by the horror of the actual occurrence. Johnstown is in a sort of hollow between two rivers and that lake must have swept over the city at a depth of 40 feet. It can't be, it is impossible, that such an awful thing could happen to a city of 40,000 inhabitants, and if it has, thousands have lost their lives, and men are to blame for it, for warnings have been uttered a thousand times and have received no attention."

Later.—The first reports of the loss of life were entirely too low. It is believed that at least 8,000 persons have perished. Of these 700 or 800 were burned in the fiery furnace at the viaduct. Two thousand coffins have been ordered for bodies already rescued.

Conemaugh is laid low, Cambria City is gone, Johnstown is utterly demolished and not a house stands in Colville.

A BRAVE YOUNG WOMAN.

An Engine Dashed by Six Inches From Her Head, But She Kept Her Nerve and Saved Her Life.

A Philadelphia despatch says: Edward Brady, a lawyer of West Philadelphia, has a daughter who has no equal for pluck and courage. After having been precipitated down a 30-foot embankment in the dark at Berwin, Thursday night, to the track of the Pennsylvania Railroad, her body pinned to the ties by the debris of a wrecked phaeton and a struggling horse, so that she could not move, she lay there while the western express train came thundering on, not knowing whether she would be killed or not, and never fainted. Fortunately her head was nearly six inches from the rail. She felt the heat of the fire-box as the engine dashed by, but smiled when released and wanted to clamber up the bank herself. Miss Brady and her escort, Mr. Ward, started Thursday morning for West Chester. Just after dark they started for home. Before reaching Berwin Station the roads turn abruptly. Ward got out and went to the horse's head, but the animal began to back towards the embankment. Ward ran to the phaeton and tried to rescue Miss Brady, but it was too late. George W. Johnson and his brother William, who live on the other side of the embankment, came rushing down and across the track, bringing a lantern. Suddenly from Philadelphia came the rumble of the express train. One of the Johnsons seized the lantern and sprinted down the track just as the headlight gleamed around the curve. He waved the light frantically. The engineer put on the brakes. Mr. Ward called to Miss Brady and asked if she could move herself, and she answered "no." Another neighbor who had joined the party added more despair by crying: "My God, the girl will be killed." The two men sprang to one side, the train crashed into the horse and the phaeton, both of which projected over the rail. The train came to a stop just before the last two cars reached the debris. Mr. Ward, by this time frantic, sprang forward expecting to see her beheaded. Before he could reach her he heard her voice saying she was all right. She had never lost her nerve while the hot breath of the engine snorted in her face and tore away the phaeton and horse from on top of her. Miss Brady was easily extricated now. Her shoes had been torn from her feet. One of the horse's feet had been cut off and three of his legs were broken.

The train remained in the cut over an hour and the conductor endeavored to persuade Miss Brady to come to town in a special train fitted with a coach. She refused, said she was all right, even attempted a pleasantry or two and walked to a drug store, where her wounds were dressed. She had quite a severe scalp wound and a large contusion on her forehead.

FREDERICK T. ROBERTS, M.D., Physician to and Professor of Clinical Medicine at University College Hospital, London, Eng., says: "Bright's disease has no symptoms of its own, and may long exist without the knowledge of the patient or practitioner, as no pain will be felt in the kidneys or that vicinity." This accounts for many people dying with Bright's Disease, or advanced kidney malady. The disease is not suspected until it reaches a fatal period. If Warner's Safe Cure is used at the proper time, the fatality from that disease would be greatly decreased. Dr. Thompson also says: "More adults are carried off in this country by chronic kidney disease than by any other one malady except consumption."

A Corner Lot Better Than a County.

Rich English ladies often send money to the United States for investment, and as they generally buy houses and lots, or something equally as good, they show more wisdom than their sisters in America, who invest their money abroad in empty titles, empty heads and empty pockets.—*Manchester (Eng.) THE CATERPILLAR PLAGUE.

An Innumerable Army Marching Through Maine—Railway Traffic Impeded and Every Green Thing Eaten.

A Bangor, Me., despatch says: The caterpillar migration now going on in Piscataquis county, along the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, is alarming the entire northern portion of the State, and much alarm is felt throughout this section that the more southern counties may yet be ravaged. The phenomenon has been going on for nearly three weeks now, and no solution has been given of the mystery. Early in the month great swarms of small green caterpillars were noticed south of the Mattamiscontis mountains, in Penobscott county, but no attention was paid to them. Two weeks ago the people in the vicinity of Milo were astonished by the visit of an army of the insects nearly five miles wide passing the town and following the railroad. On Sunday two weeks ago they crossed over to the south side of the road, swarming over the rails for a space of ten miles, blocking all traffic, as reported at the time and delaying trains over ten hours, as the insects when crushed made the rails so slippery that the engine wheels would slide, regardless of the sand used on them. Over 300 section men and citizens failed to keep the track clear, and it was five days before the long procession passed. Once across the little travellers started towards the northwest, following the road between Dover and Brownville, seemingly headed for Sebec Lake. Their number is inestimable, being millions on millions, and their passage is like that of the destroying angel, for every speck of green vegetation disappears under their voracious attacks.

Fortunately the region they are still confined to is almost entirely confined to lumbering, so the cultivated farms are happily few and far between; but these belong to poor settlers utterly unable to withstand any direct loss, and those whose plantations have been in the way of the invading host have been financially ruined, for the early crop has been swept away. The loss has already gone away up into the thousands, with no immediate signs of abating, as the migration is still steadily progressing.

The greatest annoyance is to the railroad company whose line has been selected by the caterpillars as the best promenade, and being unable to cope with the difficulty are meeting with great obstacles in running their trains, all of which are from two to eight hours behind daily. The entire county has risen up for their destruction, but it is impossible to manage them, and the subject under discussion is the feasibility of firing the forest in front and alongside of them so that they will be destroyed. Where they are going is as much a mystery as their origin and if they change their course southward again and visit the agricultural regions the damage they will do the young crops will be something enormous. So far, as stated, their course seem to be directly in this direction. Last Sunday the army was over five miles wide, being stretched along for ten miles more.

STRUCK WHILE PREACHING.

An Evangelist Hit and Blinded by Lightning.

A Danville, Ill., despatch says: The people in the country near Hillsboro', Fountain county, Ind., have just erected and dedicated a new church. Rev. J. C. Meyers, a prominent evangelist, residing at State Line, Ind., has been conducting a revival. Last evening the church was crowded to suffocation and the windows were all thrown open. About 8 o'clock, as Mr. Meyers was in the midst of his sermon, a small rain cloud passed over the church. It only discharged one bolt of lightning, which first struck and completely destroyed the church chimney, and then, dividing into branches, ran down the stove pipes, melting and destroying the stoves and tearing up the floor before it entered the ground. All the congregation were more or less affected, but none of the injuries were serious. The main branch of the bolt, on leaving the chimney, descended the pulpit chandelier, directly over the head of Mr. Meyers. He jumped high in the air, and, turning a somersault, fell heavily, face downward, on the floor. He was thought to be dead and it was more than half an hour before he showed any signs of life. On the back of his head, where the bolt struck, is a seared place an inch in diameter. The face is burned, eyelids badly puffed and eyesight gone. His friends brought him to Danville this morning for treatment, and although able to distinguish large objects, the oculist thinks blindness will be perpetual.

Kinds of Plums.

Geo. W. Cline, the President of the Grimsby Fruit Growers' Association, writes: "As to kinds of plums for planting, the list may be long or short, just as the planter likes. The varieties are numerous that are profitable for this section, but the following list is long enough and good enough for any one, and the trees can be easily and cheaply purchased, viz.: For early—Imperial Gage, Smith's Orleans, Washington, Niagara and Bradshaw. Medium—Lombard, General Hand, Pond's Seedling and Yellow Egg. Late—Quackenbos, German Prune, Reine Claude de Bavay and Coe's Golden Drop. There are others I would add, but they are not so easily got, such as Victoria, Columbia, Lawson's Golden Gage, Duane's Purple, Glass' Seedling, Munro and several others, but we have here plenty from which to select, and it is very doubtful if we ever will get any addition to these that will be any more productive or any more profitable for the grower.

An Optical Delusion.

Young Badger, from New York, on the first morning of his visit to his uncle Abner's farm appears bright and early in a pair of white flannel trousers.

Uncle Abner (taking him aside)—Gee Whitaker, nephew, why in blazes didn't you tell me you was so poor? Here, boy, take this $3 and run down street to the store and buy a pair of pants before the women folks get up.—Clothier and Furnisher.

—Judge—Is there any reason why I shall not pronounce sentence upon you? Prisoner—No; do by me just as you would do by yourself were you in my position.

—The fine new building of the Canada Life Insurance Company on King street west, Toronto, will be completed and ready for occupation on May 1st of next year.

QUEEN'S DRAWING ROOM.

Something About the Dress of Mrs. Lincoln When Presented.

A last (Wednesday) night's London cable says: The drawing-room to-day was certainly remarkable for the number of splendid costumes worn. It is true the royalties were in mourning, but this served only to show off the costumes of those who came to the throne to be presented. A good deal of curiosity was expressed among the ladies to see the new American Minister's wife and daughter. They both passed through the ordeal remarkably well, and indeed the American presentations came out very strongly. Mrs. Lincoln wore a handsome jupe of black silk, trimmed with black tulle, and embroidered with jet. A long train of black silk hung from the waist, for though it is optional to wear it from the shoulders, one feels the weight more when it is so placed. The low-cut corsage was of the same material, trimmed in the same manner. The court plumes and lappels were black. Mrs Lincoln wore a collarette of diamond stars, fastened on black velvet, and small diamond earrings. She carried a bouquet of purple flowers. Miss Lincoln, who was presented by her mother, looked very fresh and pretty in a charming debutante's gown of white poult de soie. The front of the jupe was covered with tulle, hung with tiny silver pendants, that shimmered as she walked, held in place by a chatelaine of daisies and grasses. The train was also of white poult de soie. The corsage was trimmed with tulle, daisies and grasses. Her court plumes and lappels were white. Pearls were her sole ornaments, and her bouquet consisted of pure white exotics and maidenhair fern.

Canned Goods and the Frost.

The Canadian Packers' Association held a meeting Friday, in Toronto, Mr. W. Boulter, President, in the chair. In view of the large sales recently and the probabilities of a light crop, it was decided to advance canned corn, making the minimum price 92½c per dozen. Reports were made by members on the damage to their crops by the recent frost. After taking into consideration the damage done, it was decided that it would be very inadvisable to offer the new pack of goods for sale until the season is further advanced.

Mr. A. E. Carpenter, Hamilton, said that he had not seen the effects, but had been told that all the tomato plants had been ruined. He had seen beans cut to the ground.

Mr. Teskey, Welland, reports cherries 90 per cent. destroyed, grapes frozen and lost and tomatoes all cut to the ground.

Mr. Fenton, St. Catharines, reported from a number of inquiries that the frost on Tuesday night at points down near the lake ice was ¼ inch thick. Thermometer registered 28°, or 4° below freezing. Grapes very seriously damaged; one vineyard of 60 acres and other large vineyards are totally destroyed. Plums will not be more than 10 per cent. of a crop. Some fields of tomato plants entirely destroyed and very few plants are left for resetting. All corn that was standing has been cut; also beans. Strawberries are more or less injured. Some of the late settings may produce fruit, but it will be very light. He had learned nothing definite about peaches and apples.

Help Yourself.

Fight your own battles. Hoe your own row. Ask no favors of any one, and you'll succeed a thousand times better than one who is always beseeching some one's influence and patronage. No one will ever help you as you can help yourself, because no one will be so heartily interested in your affairs. The first step will be such a long one, perhaps; but carving your own way up the mountain you make each one lead to another, and stand firm while you chop still another out. Men who have made fortunes are not those who have had $5,000 given them to start with, but boys who have started fair with a well earned dollar or two. Men who acquire fame have never been thrust into popularity by puffs begged or paid for, or given in friendly spirit. They have outstretched their own hands and touched the public heart. Men who win love do their own wooing, and I never knew a man to fail so signally as one who induced his affectionate grandmother to speak a good word for him. Whether you work for fame, for love, for money, or for anything else, work with your hands and heart and brain. Say "I will," and some day you will conquer. Never let any man have it to say, "I have dragged you up." Too many friends sometimes hurt a man more than none at all.

Dominion Customs Changes.

A number of Orders-in-Council have been passed recently in reference to customs matters. Veneers of wood, shaved or cut with a knife direct from the log, not planed or otherwise smoothed or manufactured in any way, are rated for duty under item No. 153 of the schedule at 10 per cent. ad valorem. Second process molasses, testing by polariscope less than 35 degrees, when imported by manufacturers of blacking for use in their own factories in the manufacture of blacking, may hereafter come in duty free under certain conditions; wire of iron or steel, galvanized, tinned or coppered, or not of 16 gauge or smaller, when imported by manufacturers of wire cloth, wire work, brushes, pianos and plated ware, to be used for these purposes only in their own factories, is also placed on the free list. Yarns made of wool or worsted, the same being genapped, dyed and finished, when imported by manufacturers of braids, cords, tassels and fringes, to be used for these purposes only in their own factories, are placed on the free list until the end of the next session of Parliament. The Order-in-Council interpreting item No. 57 of the tariff so far as it relates to plough plates, mould boards and land sides, which expired at the close of last session, is continued in force until the end of next session.

Sent Home to Die.

Harry Finch, a third term convict, was released from the Central Prison yesterday on a special pardon granted by the Minister of Justice in order that he may go to his home in London, Ont., to spend the few hours of life remaining to him. Finch has a bad record, having been an inmate of the Kingston Penitentiary as well as the Central.

—However hard it may be to live on a small salary, it is a good deal harder to die on one.

CURRENT TOPICS.

As a New York World correspondent, looking from the vantage ground of the Isthmus itself, sums it up, 20,000 lives and $200,000,000 have been thrown away on the grand De Lesseps fiasco.

The Marquis of Donegal recently stated in the Bankruptcy Court that his liabilities amounted to $2,594,425 and his total income to only $3,400 a year. He attributes his insolvency to the fact that his expenditure has exceeded his income.

The "regal red poppy" has recently been found to have the valuable power of binding with its roots the soil in which it grows in such a manner that it will prove most valuable in supporting embankments. Already several French engineers have undertaken the sowing of railway embankments with poppies.

Dr. Dix says the new Episcopal cathedral in New York will be "one of the handsomest structures in the world.' There are four grand plans to choose from, and the drawback is "an embarrassment of riches" in the matter of design. Whether that will be so in the case of the building fund is less clear.

Mme. Blavatsky, the Theosophist, has explained the Keely Motor. She says: "The force is in Keely, is part of him and will die with him." The stockholders of the Keely Motor Company should get Keely's life insured for a large amount. Or does Mme. Blavatsky mean that there is no hope for the shareholders?

Justice Kersten, of Chicago, gave this advice to a prisoner who was brought before him for sentence: "Do you know what you ought to do? You ought to get a pistol and blow your brains out. I'll give you a pistol in two minutes if you'll do it." Judge Kersten would make a first-class associate for Mr. Justice Begbie, of British Columbia.

The father of Hugh Mottram Brooks, alias Maxwell, who was hanged at St. Louis last summer for the murder of Charles Arthur Preller, clings with pitiful persistence to the belief that his boy was innocent. The foreman of the jury that convicted Brooks recently received a letter from the old gentleman, who lives in England, which is full of bitterness against those whom he styles the murderers of his son.

The latest time-saving invention is known as the "portelectric system" for the transportation of mail matter. The inventors claim that they can transfer the mails from Boston to New York in less than one hour, by means of electricity and an elevated track. This would mean a speed of about five miles a minute. It is suggested also that the same device, with slight modifications of speed, could be used for passenger service.

At Mr. Clifford's lecture at Prince's Hall, London, on "Father Damien and the Leper Settlement at Molokai," Mr. Clifford amused the audience very much by a description of a Hawaiian chief who came to meet some American missionaries with his nine wives, all being in a state of complete nudity, and who, on being remonstrated with on this want of clothing, came the next day alone, wearing a straw hat and a pair of gloves.

This is a good time of the year for bad men to switch off on side tracks and simmer down into a state of blessed quietude. The most wretchedly mistaken man in the world is he who thinks he has to do some desperate deed. He is the silliest man of the silly season. To him the whole world might say: Cool off, take your bearings; go listen to the thunders of Niagara; sit by the solemn sea; climb a mountain; do anything, in fact, but make a fool of yourself.

Queen Victoria has selected a new maid of honor, Miss Loftus, a niece of Lady Ely. She is a pretty, bright girl, and went down to Windsor before she was appointed to be inspected by the royal family, and being approved of was gazetted. It is said that during the life of John Brown his approval of any new appointment was always a sine qua non, and that he had strong likes and dislikes about many of the household, which he never failed to show when the opportunity arose.

Advertisements are often very amusing in their attempts to illustrate aptly the art of puffing. For example, a vendor of a new tobacco thus describes it: "It is like your first love—fresh, genial and rapturous. Like that, it fills up all the cravings of your soul." The author of that advertisement would no doubt agree with the statement that the tradesman who does not advertise liberally has been very appropriately compared to a man who has a lantern but who is too stingy to buy a candle.

The Duke of Wellington has told Lord Stanhope some curious facts about Queen Victoria's name. It seems that Her Majesty was really christened Victorina, after her mother, the Duchess of Kent, but during Queen Caroline's trial there was so much unpleasant gossip about Bergami's daughter - la petite Victorina—that the name was quietly changed to Victoria. George IV. refused to attend his niece's christening, because the Duke of Kent would not give her one of the family names, Sophia being the one desired.

According to the Pall Mall Gazette, Capt. Ingram, who was recently killed by an elephant in South Africa, some time before his death unwound the cere cloth of an Egyptian mummy. Inside he discovered a tablet which, being translated, was found to prophesy that the person who profaned the clothes would die a violent death within three months of his sacrilegious act and his bones be scattered to the winds. Within the prescribed time the threat or prophecy came true. Capt. Ingram was killed in South Africa, and only his thigh bone remained to attest his fate.

In his article on "Slavery in Africa," in the June "Scribner," Professor Henry Drummond (the author of "Tropical Africa") says: "Do not let it be supposed that this horror is over, that this day of tribulation is at an end. This horror and this day are now. It is not even abating. Slavery is on the increase. Time, civilization, Christianity are not really touching it. No fact in relation to the slave trade is more appalling than this. The fact of this increase, for a time denied, then doubted, has at last been reluctantly admitted, even by the Government of England."

The London Weekly Despatch says the Government of New South Wales are obliterating the Queen's head from its postage stamps. "That symbol of Imperial unity," the Despatch continues, "has been replaced on the penny stamps by Sydney Harbor. The twopenny stamp is embossed with a figure of the Emu. Another Australian bird—the Lyre—adorns the eightpenny stamp, while the image of Captain Cook, the discoverer of Australia, is impressed upon the fourpenny stamp. For their shilling stamp the democrats of New South Wales have gone to the Kangaroo, the most characteristic of the Australian fauna.

Light shades of paper make a room look more cheerful; large figures make a room look much smaller and occasion much waste in matching the figures. Low rooms should be papered with striped paper having the stripes run up and down, as it makes the room seem much higher. Subdued tints take off the glare of too many windows. The best effect is produced by having a paper with pattern and colors of a quiet tone, such as does not at once strike the eye on coming into the room. The paper should relieve and set out the furniture that stands in front of it, not attract attention from it.

If the Turkish Government consents, says a letter in the Philadelphia Press, it is probable that Palestine will be invaded by locomotives, and that before long the conductor will have an opportunity of calling out, "Galilee; all out for Galilee," and in good Turkish, "Damascus passengers will please retain their seats till the train comes to a full stop." Application has been made by Joseph Elias, formerly Government engineer of Lebanon, for a commission for a railway from Haifa, on the Mediterranean, about midway between Tyre and Mesarea, by way of Lake Galilee, over the River Jordan to Damascus.

The Oklahoma boom has proved to be very short lived. Marshal Needles thinks that by August Guthrie will have a population of about 200, though in the early days of the occupation it had 10,000. Only 1,800 entries of land have been made, and probably not 1,000 of these by actual farmers. The land is poor, and the rumpus that has been made for four or five years past about the settlement of the country has had no solid basis. The rush of the last month was mainly of gamblers, speculators and other loose fish, and they are getting away as fast as possible, because they can make nothing by preying on each other, and there is nobody else there to pluck.

Sir Edwin Chadwick, in an address on sanitary science, says: "Physicians are beginning to declare that a large amount of crime for which punishment is inflicted is due to insanity, and that insanity is due to low physical condition which sanitation by early physical training would remove. There are experiences to show that this is the fact. Dr. Ashe and others conversant with the lunatic asylum declare that, as a class, lunatics are of a low physical condition, and the low condition is reducible by sanitation and early physical training. Of 30,000 blind persons the late Dr. Rolph declared that two-thirds might have been saved by early sanitation."

The newest personal adornment in the old world takes the form of hairs from the tail of the African elephant. These hirsute appendages, made into watch guards or bracelets, with gold embellishments, are strictly the fashion. The elephant is just now the most valuable animal under the face of the sun. Not only are his caudal hairs worth more than their weight in gold, but his tusks cost $550 a ton. Matabele Land is the favorite, indeed, perhaps the last, home of the "great earth-shaking beast." He is being hunted in the most merciless way, though perhaps not more so than the American alligator, the Egyptian crocodile and the Mexican lizard, whose hides are the "rage" both in London and Paris. And this change has been effected solely by feminine caprice.

Hospital puts in a plea for the exercise of all the limbs of the body, remarking that the majority of weak, flabby hearts are weak and flabby because every other muscle in the body is weak and flabby, and this general weakness and flabbiness is due to want of vigorous use. Exercise of the legs and back and arms gives additional and much-needed exercise to the heart, and the heart grows strong by vigorous exercise exactly as every other muscular organ does, for the heart is a muscle. If a man has no organic disease of the heart, no enlargement, and no functional disorder, plenty of brisk walking, with occasional running, will soon dispel his breathlessness and heart weakness, other things being equal. The muscular inactivity of the modern town man is the parent of more ill-health than any other single cause whatever.

A New York woman says that women are, as a rule, more deceptive than men—a fact which, she thinks, is the result of education more than disposition. "I am often," she says, "sorely puzzled in bringing up my own girls, how to teach them to be decorous and polite in other ways, fulfil all the requirements of what are considered good manners, and at the same time be truthful. Women are not allowed to express their own real desires and deepest feelings, but are rather schooled to repress themselves and conceal anything in their nature that would offend the rules of propriety. The world, they are taught, expects them to be models of decorum, whether their inclinations are to be decorous or not. Hence deception is one of the first things they learn, and small wonder if a habit of lying grows on some of them."

The Duke of Buccleuch is getting up with an influential committee an exhibition in which many of his own family relics will figure. It is to be an exhibition of weapons —"butchering tools"—and it will be inaugurated on a day famous in the history of slaughter, to wit, Waterloo. The exhibition is to be a sort of national record. Its weapons will be memorials of battles in which Scotchmen have fought during the last four and a half centuries. There will be war relics of border fights, of battles in the Peninsula, the Punjaub, India, Burmah, the Crimea, Egypt, West Africa. The committee is, of course, composed of North Britons. Lord Napier of Magdala is a Scot, and he serves upon it. Sir Patrick Grant is another, and a Field-Marshal to boot, and he serves upon it. So do The Macpherson of Cluny, Sir W. Lockhart and Sir Arch. Alison.

The islands in Georgian Bay, especially Manitoulin Island, Cockburn and St. Joseph Islands, belonging to Canada, and Drummond and Sugar Islands, belonging to the States, are the natural home of the cedar tree. They are of limestone formation, and the cedar is almost the only tree that grows there and it grows both on the heights and in the swamps. If any area of ground is burned over, the second growth is always cedar. Ever since the land has been opened up by the Ontario Government United States merchants and dealers in cedar have turned their eyes to the Canadian islands, and have bought their material there. The City Engineer of Chicago and his predecessors all state that Georgian Bay cedar is the best, and in the Chicago market it fetches 25 per cent. more than any other kind of cedar, if any other kind is ever allowed to be used for the pavements of Chicago.

According to a Baltimore paper the girls of that aristocratic city are indulging in a very remarkable fad. They dress in black from head to foot, and then, borrowing a neighbor's child, show it around the city. Of course, the natural supposition is that the child is not borrowed and that the young lady is a widow. As a widow is generally supposed to be ready to recontract matrimony, the sympathies of the susceptible young man are readily aroused, first by curiosity as to how long the child's father has been dead, then, what he died of, and, since the widow seems to mourn for him, how she must have cared for the dear departed. And, if she did care for him, why might she not care also for another, and why might not he be the fortunate individual, especially if the first husband left cash enough for the supply of two or three, as the case might be? Of course, when acquaintance follows, the apparent widowhood can be easily and innocently explained and the desired happy result follow.

Speaking of his father's physical recreations, Mr. Herbert Gladstone says in the Birmingham Times: "He used to be chiefly fond of rowing, riding and shooting, but during the last 20 or 25 years he has had to give up those forms of exercise, and, as is well known, to confine myself mainly to cutting down trees, which he does habitually. He also was a great walker, and not more than 15 years ago he walked 35 miles over the hills in Scotland. In my opinion he is still good for a 20 mile tramp. He always attached the greatest importance to physical recreations and he lost no opportunity of encouraging us in them. He has proved their benefits and I think is not a bad specimen of their value. But it was only in manly sports and games, in rational recreations, that he stimulated and led us. What did he do as regards himself? He sent me to Eton, and every one must be pretty well satisfied that a lad at Eton would get enough physical recreation."

He Fooled His Bishop.

A good story is told of one of the most popular clergymen in a city not 100 miles from Brooklyn. He is a pleasant, genial man, and on a certain evening in every week a few of his brother priests meet at the rectory and they spend together an hour or two in a social way. Some curmudgeon in the neighborhood happening to get a glimpse through the blinds at a bottle and glasses and the smoke of cigars and to hear the sound of cheerful laughter, thought it behooved him to let the bishop know what was going on. Thereupon he wrote to that distinguished functionary, of course greatly exaggerating what he had seen and heard. The worthy priest got wind of this in some mysterious way and was on his guard. One night while he and his friends were enjoying themselves a ring came to the door. Going up stairs to the second door the good father saw a brougham of familiar build standing outside. Raising the window he looked down and discovered the bishop on the stoop.

"Who's there?" he asked.

"It's I, the Bishop," was the reply.

"Oh, go 'along! You're an impostor," said the priest. "The bishop is a decent gentleman, and would never be roaming around the streets at this time of night. Be off with you at once or I'll call for the police and have you taken in as a suspicious character."

With that he banged down the window and went back to his friends. The bishop paid no more late visits to the rectory, and the pleasant weekly symposium is continued.—Brooklyn Citizen.

The Rod.

A rather curious angling incident occurred the other day in the neighborhood of Kelso, Scotland. A young lad named Scott, residing at Maxwellheugh, and employed as a clerk in Kelso Mills, was fishing below the mill wheel. He hooked a large trout, which ultimately broke his tackle and got free. The next day he went to try his fortune at the same place, and in a very short time—his gut line being a little stronger than on the previous occasion—he had on the same trout which he hooked the day before, and this time it was safely landed. The fish had the lost hook and a portion of the gut line in its mouth. From the time it broke the line until it was caught the next day the fish must have remained about the same place. Anglers have been known to occasionally catch fish with hooks and gut lines in their mouths, but seldom has the angler who lost the tackle caught the fish that "broke."

The heaviest salmon which has been killed by an angler this year was landed a few days ago by Captain Vansittart, from the famous Castle Connel water, on the Shannon, Ireland. It was a fresh-run fish, and weighed 44½ lb.

In Guy's (London) Hospital Reports, vol. 1, page 396, is found the statement: "Simple hypertrophy (enlargement) of the heart, especially of the left ventricle, is found without valvular incompetency. In this numerous class the cardiac is secondary (a symptom) to the renal affection." This explains why Warner's Safe Cure is effectual in cases of heart disease. It removes from the blood the kidney acid which causes the heart disease.

A Gift from the Pope.

The Owl, the Ottawa College paper, says: "A letter from Rome brings the information that His Holiness Leo XIII. has given another proof of his esteem for Ottawa University by presenting to it a magnificent portrait of himself, in the attitude of giving his blessing. This painting is the work of a celebrated Italian artist, and was painted expressly for exhibition at the Paris Exposition. It left Rome for Ottawa on May 8th."

HOW TO PREPARE STRAWBERRIES.

Hints to the Ladies Which Are Worth Pondering Over.

If strawberries from the market always come to our hands as free from dust and grit as the hot-house specimens forced on us during the winter months, or as the carefully protected fruit of English conservatories, which are usually served with the stems on and without washing, it would only be necessary to arrange the beautiful scarlet cones on a pretty dish and serve them au naturel, to be dipped in sugar and eaten with the fingers, as they usually are served on English tables. But most of our strawberries need washing, and we want to eat them covered with cream and sugar, and with a spoon or a fork, as some extremists in table manners would have us do. Yet in washing and hulling them much of the piquant flavor which distinguishes the strawberries may be lost if they are not carefully handled. Usually as soon as they are hulled they begin to "bleed," and if then they are put into water much of their delicious juice is lost. The way to avoid this is to wash them before removing the hulls. Do not pour the water on and off them as careless servants will sometimes do, leaving sand and berries in the bottom of the dish together, but drop them gently into a pan of water, stir them around a little to dislodge all particles of grit, etc., then lift them out a few at a time and lay them in a colander to drain. It is an excellent idea to use a square of new cheese-cloth, kept for the sole purpose, to dry the strawberries. This absorbs the moisture much more rapidly and thoroughly than it will drain off. Take the berries from the colander, a few at a time, and let them lie on the cloth as you hull them one by one. The cloth must be scalded each time it is used, and dried, but not washed with soap and ironed; of course it will show stains, but will be clean. When the strawberries are washed, remove the hulls carefully with a silver knife, pinching them off may be as well, but it is difficult to avoid bruising the berries in doing so. Arrange the strawberries in a pretty glass dish, the finest on the top—following the example of the market men—and if strawberry leaves, which are the prettiest, are not to be had, a few young crisp leaves of lettuce, as a garnish, make an effective contrast. The leaves may be laid around inside the dish before putting in the strawberries.

Some persons like strawberries sugared and set away on ice a little while before serving, and when they are not very ripe or a little tart it is a good way, but they do not look so pretty, and, unless all the family like them so, it is better to let each one add cream and sugar according to individual taste.—Demorest.

Temperance Notes.

In regard to surgical operations every physician dreads to have anything to do with beer-drinkers. It is dangerous for a beer drinker to even cut his finger.—N. S. Therm.

The number of Jamaica ginger drunkards is said to be increasing at an alarming rate. A confirmed drunkard takes four ounces of the fiery fluid at one time and the effects are even worse than those of whiskey.

A statement has been issued by the Northwestern Life Insurance Company, of Milwaukee, to the effect that their business is seriously injured by shortened lives of men who drink lager beer, and that no policy will be issued to any lager beer brewer or any man employed in a brewery.

One of the first literary men in the United States said to a temperance lecturer, "There is one thing I wish you to do everywhere, intreat every mother not to give a drop of strong drink to a child. I have had to fight as for my life all my days to keep from dying a drunkard, because I was fed with spirits when a child. I thus acquired an appetite for it. My brother, poor fellow, died a drunkard."

The ancient Solons of government would doubtless be mightily amazed could they step into Kansas to-day. Five cities of that State are under the government of women. Five women are serving as Mayors and twenty-five on City Councils. Three are performing the difficult duties of Police Judge. A dozen women are county superintendents of public instruction, and several are acting as City Clerk or Treasurer. In addition to these a large number, probably 200 are acceptably serving on School Boards.

A Home for Poor Freemasons.

For over thirty years the Freemasons of New York State have been striving for a home to shelter helpless craftsmen and their families. As a means to this end the Masonic Temple in Twenty-third street was erected. Its income was to be devoted to the support of the proposed asylum. At last the great organization is ready to build a refuge for its unfortunate members. It has a good part of the construction fund in hand, and the Temple furnishes over $50,000 a year for maintenance. Auburn will probably be the site of this grand institution. What a noble character such a secret society as this presents when compared with the organized thugism—parading under a thin disguise of patriotism—which has imported and is attempting to perpetuate European feuds on American soil. Charity is the inspiration of the one and hate the controlling motive of the other.—N. Y. Herald.

THE LADIES' WORKBOX.

Fashion's Fancies.

French challies, which come in pretty floral designs, make very dainty summer dresses.

Bordered gingham and cotton goods are now shown in large varieties, and make stylish dresses.

Long black lace wraps, lined with pale gray or lavender surah, are popular for middle-aged ladies.

Tan-colored goat-skin shoes will take the place of canvas shoes this summer for the sea-side and mountains.

Printed foulards are very fashionable, and among the favorite colors are pale green, dull blue, purple and copper.

The latest design in brooches are represented in the form of rare and delicate orchids, sprays of mignonette, wild roses and other flowers.

Handsome pins and combs of brilliant stones and metals are now used to hold in place a lady's hair, the style of dressing being either high or low.

Blouse waists of washing silk, brier-stitched, are popular with yachting costumes, and are worn with a wide belt, fastened by an immense silver buckle.

The plain tailor-made gowns of faced cloth or cheviot is still considered the most refined dress for general wear, and there is no trimming save buttons of the material.

Stylish hats have crowns of all heights and brims of all twists, and the most popular trimming is flowers, which are used in great profusion, and frequently compose the entire hat.

A brimless bonnet, horse-shoe shape, has a wreath of Nile green hop blossoms around the edge, veiled with a frill of black lace, and the puffed black lace crown has Nile green "baby" ribbon run through beading.

The monk's cloak for travelling is made of brown Carmelite wool, and envelops the wearer from head to foot, while there is a genuine monk's hood at the back, and the cloak is confined at the waist by a knotted rope of brown wool.

Tennis costumes have become so popular that they are no longer strictly confined to the play-ground, but are worn for morning wear, especially at summer resorts. They are found exceedingly comfortable, and are alike pretty for the lady or the young miss, and are usually made of striped flannel.

Black watered silk, and the ribbon of all widths, bids fair to grow in popularity during the spring and summer seasons. For those who cannot afford a black lace gown of the best quality, black point d'esprit is fashionable. Made elaborately or with simple plaited skirts, be sure to add fully two or three bows of narrow moire ribbon, run on in rows of three and four about the skirt hems, up and down the front of the waist, on the sleeves, and, in fact, wherever a bow or a band can be laid. Finish with a broad moire sash, and the effect will be eminently pretty and stylish.

Remnants of delicately colored silks and mulls can be converted into no notable vests and worn with any gown, and can easily be made at home under the usual cost. About the throat fits a high collar of white silk, buttoned or hooked at the back, while one breadth of silk serves to make the vest, which should be sloped slightly to fit the curve of the collar, then gathered in, laid in very fine plaits, or smocked in two rows. In case of the full gathers, let the whole fall loose and full in the Moliere vest, but, if plaited, draw down smoothly and finish at the waist by a band of silk or dark velvet, and if the breadth be sufficiently long make the full vest, then draw the remainder to the right hip, and let the end hang in a fringe.

Consumption from House Sweepings.

The Muncheuer Medicinische Wochenschrift No. 30, reports that Carnet has experimented with the dust obtained from the walls and floors of various dwellings in which tuberculous patients have been, inoculating guinea pigs with it, and carefully excluding all possibility of infection from outside sources. In this way, 21 rooms of seven Berlin hospitals were examined and bacilli found to have been present in the dust from most of them. Positive results were also obtained with the dust from insane asylums and penitentiaries. The dwellings of 53 tubercular patients were investigated in the same way, and the dust in the neighborhood of 20 patients found to be virulent. It was the case, with absolute regularity, that the dust was always virulent when the patient had been in the habit of spitting on the floor, or in a handkerchief, while it was never so when a spit cup had been employed.

How to Tell Her Age.

Girls of a marriageable age do not like to tell how old they are, but you can find out by following the subjoined instructions, the young lady doing the figuring: Tell her to put down the number of the month in which she was born, then to multiply it by 2, then to add 5, then to multiply it by 50, then to add her age, then to subtract 365, then to add 115, then tell her to tell you the amount she has left. The two figures to the right will tell you her age and the remainder the month of her birth. For example, the amount is 823, she is 22 years old, and was born in the eighth month (August). Try it.—Reading Telegram.

Passed

Mr. Jos. Stafford, 4th line, Artemesia, has completed his third year at Toronto University, and at the examinations held last week successfully passed in chemistry, biology, mineralogy and geology.

"A Big Go."

A small detachment of the Salvation Army struck town on Monday evening and paraded the streets for a short time after which they went to the Town Hall and had what they styled a "big go." What the "go" consisted of we can only surmise, as an admission fee of ten cents was charged. Of course it is against our principle to pay ten cents to see any show of this description. They gave too much for the money.

Off to Camp.

The "rogers" (No. 6 company) left for camp at Niagara on Tuesday morning. The boys looked well with uniforms neat and countenances cheerful. They will return a week from Saturday next with betel-nut cheeks, skinned noses and soiled uniforms—that is if the sun ever get its tannery in operation again.

Rain.

Did you hear any person remark that the crops need rain? The man who would not be satisfied with what has fallen during the past three weeks must be in the transition state between fish and fowl, with a very close connection to the former. For three round weeks we have not had one day of solid sunshine, and only two days in which it did not rain more or less.

Garden Party.

The garden party at Maxwell on Thursday last was a great success, as it always is. Flesherton brass band was present and played a number of selections ill their usual excellent manner. There were between 250 and 300 people present. Several went from Flesherton and enjoyed themselves thoroughly. There were games of all kinds. An excellent repast was served at 6 o'clock. Proceeds, $50. Our Maxwell correspondent gives further particulars.

Division Court.

At the Division Court held here on Wednesday last, the most important case heard was that of the now well known organ case of Connell v. Brander. Mr. Brander, of Priceville, purchased an organ from Mr. Connell, of Owen Sound. He then cancelled his order and purchased a cheaper instrument from another agent Mr. Connell sued for the price of his instrument, which had been delivered at Flesherton station and was burned along with the station building a year ago. When the case was first tried decision was given in favor of defendant. It was then taken to Owen Sound, and from there to the Court of Appeal in Toronto, from thence it was referred once more to the Division Court here. It occupied nearly the whole of the day on Wednesday last, and was tried before a jury. Verdict was given for plaintiff.

Rev. Mr. Shilton Removed.

The Methodist Conference at St. Mary's has seen fit in their wisdom to remove our pastor, Rev. J W. Shilton, B.A., from this place to Seaforth. Mr. Shilton has built up Flesherton charge very much during the past two years, and he and his genial lady have endeared themselves to the hearts of our people of every denomination. So much is this the case that Flesherton Methodists are very loth to part with his services. Yet, while envying Seaforth its good fortune they are ready to say God speed to their departing pastor and to extend a welcome to the new incumbent. Rev Mr Shilton is a minister young in the service, and being endowed with a fine physique, free delivery and powerful voice, is destined to become a successful pulpit orator, and it is with extreme pleasure we personally note his step upward by the late transfer. Rev. Mr. Henders, late of Hespeler, will be Mr. Shilton's successor in Flesherton.

POLITENESS IN SCHOOLS.

BY JANE E ANDERSON, DURHAM, TEACHER S. S. NO. 2, EUTINCK AND GLENELG.

In considering this subject, let us regard it, not as an end, but as a most important means. Let us consider 1st. Why is it that rudeness predominates in the majority of our schools, that the polite pupil is the exception, the rara avis, while the rude one is the rule? 2nd. Why should politeness be a marked characteristic of every school? and 3rd. How can we best succeed in giving it its essential place in our schools?

1st. Why is it that rudeness is so very prevalent in our schools? No doubt many of us console ourselves with the idea that it is owing to the neglect of parents, and that though numbers of our children are outside of school hours, allowed to "run wild," we are not to blame, that the home is the place to teach morals and manners. True enough, but where the home fails in its duty the school must come to the rescue, and the teacher must be for six hours daily "in loco parentis." Though rudeness in our schools is to a certain extent attributable to a lack of home-training it is, in a far greater degree, attributable to our neglect, as teachers, to make the most of the golden opportunities within our reach, and too often is it but the reflection of our rudeness to our pupils, for as the rivulet in the meadow reflects not only the sunshine, but the shadows, so do those mirrors of our actions reproduce not only our virtues, but our failings. Don't misunderstand me. I do not for one moment suppose that any one (even the very last recruit) in the noble army of teachers is guilty of positive rudeness to pupils; but I do maintain that very many of us are guilty, if not every day of our lives, at least very often, of a negative rudeness,—such grave breaches of etiquette as would not be tolerated in cultured society. How many of us practice in our school rooms our "society manners?" Do we treat our young friends as politely in our schools, as we would in our parlor, or even as politely as we expect them to treat us? Why, some of us actually begin the day by outraging the feelings of the most sensitive pupils by walking deliberately past them into school without so much as the "Good-morning" that many of those self-same pupils accord their dumb friends. Or a day thus begun, I'm sure the teacher is ruder than the rudest of his or her pupils. We know better, and many of them do not and never will unless we are and up doing, alive to our duty in this repect. But we say (and we all know the old worn-out excuses,) "No time," "over-crowded school room and programmes." Very true, but "no time" "over crowded school-rooms and programmes" do not enable us, as one writer suggests, to do away with character building in our schools. We cannot do it, for if we are not, both by example and precept, laying such a foundation of politeness as shall ornament the whole superstructure of after life, we are by that very neglect laying the foundation stones of rudeness and immorality. Let us not be satisfied to leave this subject to home-training any more than we'd leave reading or arithmetic, lest from the conduct of our pupils, we be thought to agree with Will Carleton's District father where he says:

"There ain't no great good in their speaken'
Their words so polite as I see,
Provided you know what the facks is,
And tell 'em off just as they be.

And what "great good" is there? This brings me to the second point, viz. Why should politeness be a marked characteristic of every school? Why is it necessary that, in order that our schools may fulfil their highest function, they should be characterized by a spirit of genuine politeness?

First. Because it enlists sympathy. There is nothing that establishes a bond of sympathy between teacher and pupil like the pleasant, though often half-hearted "Good-morning children," and the cheerful, hearty response of thirty, forty or fifty voices coming like the morning sun, to drive away every shadow of the night, "Good-morning Teacher." They feel the teacher's interest in them and are ready to be interested; the teacher is more energetic and the pupils more attentive for it. Second. It exterminates selfishness and jealousy from our schools, and consequently petty disagreements and quarrels from our play grounds. No child, whatever his disposition, can be selfish, jealous or unkind very long, in a school where true politeness, that generous consideration of the rights and feelings of others, to which St. Paul refers when he says, "Let each esteem other better than themselves, in honor perferring one another," is not only taught but lived by both teacher and pupils. Third. It instils in our boys a manly consideration of their girl playmates, and teaches our girls to expect from them that deference which every true woman expects from a gentleman. No boy that is required by his teacher to lay aside his individual comfort in behalf of his girl friend, to give up his chair when she is standing, to offer her the cup before drinking, to attend to the stove, the wood and the water without having to be asked,—little things it is true, but "mighty oaks from little acorns grow"—can go out into the home to see any woman kind, sister, wife or mother, do any work that he could do, while he sits idly by, reading his paper, perhaps ignoring her very existence. Nor will a girl who has been courteously treated in school submit to such treatment as they only too often meet with in after life, and as "habit becomes second nature," politeness in the school room means politeness in the home, better boys and girls, better men and women, happier homes and altogether a better state of society. Fourth. Politeness is a stepping stone to morality. Prof. S.H. Albro says "You cannot have rudeness in your school and do good moral work," and surely every teacher aims at elevating humanity, lifting it up to higher levels, and our efforts in this direction have a far greater influence on our own lives than perhaps we are aware of, for before we can raise up our pupils, we ourselves must first be up, must always be on the lookout for some way of benefitting them morally as well as intellectually, some way of lightening the heaviest cross that many of them have to bear. Thus by the very thoughtfulness which politeness compels, teacher and pupils become daily more like Him, whose perfect life is our pattern, who, though His work was made little of, and He Himself misunderstood by His most intimate friends, yet "went about doing good" not only that we "might have life" but that we "might have it more abundantly"; and the

Politeness in Schools

...come we become like Him and our teaching like His, the more shall our pupils be enabled to live better, nobler, ...

Assuming then that politeness is essential to true manhood and womanhood and that we as teachers are to blame for its non-existence in our schools, it yet remains for us to decide how we can best succeed in gaining it its essential place in our ...

The most effective way is by individual teaching. Do not take it into your head, and lecture your pupils on politeness at a time on Good Behaviour. Do not let them even suspect that you are trying to make them polite. Incidents will occur in every school which, aided by a few well-selected, well-directed words from the teacher, impress on the minds of the pupils lessons in politeness more effective. For instance ... will pardon me for referring to personal experiences ... teaching in a certain school. ... as they came in ... "Good ... Mary. "Good morning ... with the same resulting reply. ... ringing the bell, all in position, ... I want your opinion." ... every child was said ... "If I were not your horse ... not be and I said, ... Anderson, what ... you expect me to do?" Every ... was raised "To stay for tea." "To say Good-morning." "To answer her." ... some of the many answers given. "But if I had not answered her what would you think?" "That you didn't know very much." was one answer. "That you weren't glad to see her" another. Taking the latter, I said, "Now I've said Good morning to each one of you on these two mornings ... no one has answered me. Am I to think you are not glad to see me?" As I have n't time to say Good morning to each of you, I'll say it to all, and I know you'll answer me. "Good morning girls, and immediately there ... forth such a cheerful "Good morning, Miss A." as would for the time being, ... any teacher with ... "Now, I said, "Girls, in what position was I when I spoke?" "Standing" was the answer. "And you?" No reply. "Now try again." "Good morning girls." All standing, ... was hearty as before. "Good morning, Miss A."

"Now boys, if a lady meets a gentleman on the road and says "Good morning" to him, how does he salute her?" "He raises his hat." "Well, if you haven't your hats on I want you to give me a right hand salute. "Good morning, boys." Every boy on his feet, every right hand to the forehead, and the walls ring with the cheerful "Good morning, Miss A." At 4 o'clock I said, "Good night girls" and "Good night boys" in turn, and no one needed to ask "What must I do"? Thus, in far less time than it takes to tell, we have established in our school such a form of greeting and leave-taking as any teacher might be proud to receive from his or her pupils. Similarly, after the departure of our first visitor, I impressed them with the fact that every visitor in a school is the guest not only of the teacher, but of the pupils, and as such must be received by them standing, a piece of wis... we so often find, every head turned round and every eye staring—and so on. Opportunities daily present themselves for such lessons, which in my experience rarely have to be repeated.

But however well-directed, however well-chosen, these lessons are not enough. Use constantly the "bunch ... ys," "Good morning," "Good night," "If you please," "Thank you," "Excuse me," "I beg your pardon," as ... has require... pupils to use it. Be ... you would have your pupils be. ... what you would have them do, and ... assured that they will find out for ... selves the use and beauty of ... iteness and appreciate it accordingly ... wherein if you are not polite, ... amount of lecturing will instil in ... r pupils principles, which it is only ... evident are lacking in yourself. ... the ideal which you present them, and you will never lack followers among your pupils. They will respect, love, obey and imitate you.

As in the elder days of art
Builders wrought with greatest care
Each minute and unseen part
For the Gods see everywhere
Let us do our work as well
Both the unseen and the seen.
Make the house where Gods may dwell
... stly, complete and clean.

ACROSS THE CONTINENT.

A Lady's Trip to the Golden State via C. P. R.

Through the Rocky Mountain Gorges—A Vivid Description of Grand Scenery—Arrival at Vancouver

Specially Written for The Advance.

Remarkable contrast between ranges is noticeable. To the right are fantastically broken and castellated heights, on the left massive snow-laden mountains rising thousands of feet into the air, whose peaks seem to tower into the very heavens, and are lost to view in the clouds overhanging them. On either sides of the river the mountains rise in solid masses until Cascade Mountain closes the view westward. Here the pass we are travelling through narrows suddenly, and we seem to be shut in with apparently no way of exit; forgetting sometimes just where we were and how travelling, we ... ourselves wondering how we ... get out. We presently leave the Bow River and follow the Cascade valley directly to the Cascade mountains. At Anthracite is the shadow of the Cascade, we pass the great coal mine.

... 5 o'clock p.m. we arrive at Banff ... and pictures... spot, the station for Hot Springs, a mediæval watering ... and pleasure resort. Here we saw on the platform the familiar face of Frank Beatty, formerly of Flesherton, looking hale and hearty. We had only time to exchange greetings, as the train stopped but a few minutes. Now we are rushing on again, getting farther and farther into the mountains, and wilder and wilder becomes the scenery. Leaving Banff the line again rejoins the Bow, and runs through a forested valley. The back-ward view is fine, while ahead is an excellent view of Mt Massive. Hole in the Wall Mountain is passed, and nearing Castle Mountain station, Castle Mountain looms up ahead to our right and just behind the station is a precipice of 5000 feet. It looked exactly like an old castle with spires, turrets and battlements, also a door in the centre. We said to each other it would not take us long to walk around it, and as we thought, could run over it in a few minutes, but upon enquiring at the station, were informed it was eight miles across the front, and ten miles away, and would take half a day to walk to the foot of it, as three gentlemen had gone a few days before. How near in appearance, yet so far in reality.

After passing this point the mountains on each ... become exceedingly grand and prominent. Turning to the left and looking back, the central peak of Pilot Mountain is seen, snow capped, like a leaning pyramid. Next to it is Copper Mountain and Temple Mountain, then Mt. Hector comes into view, which is the first of the great glaciers.

... of Mount Stephen is far ... to the ... Mountain of Canada.

The station as well as the mountain is called after Sir George Stephen Hector Bart. President of the C.P.R. Co.

From here the line descends rapidly, passing the beautiful Wapta lake and crossing the deep gorge of Wapta or Kicking Horse River. The scenery here is sublime and terrible. The line clings to the mountain side at the left, while at the right the valley deepens until the river is seen gleaming a thousand feet below. The canyon rapidly deepens until the mountain sides become vertical, rising straight up thousands of feet, and within an easy stones throw from wall to wall. Down this terrible chasm go the railway and river together, the former crossing and re-crossing from side to side to ledges cut out of the solid rock, twisting and turning in every direction, and every minute or two plunging through projecting angles of rock which seem to close the way. With the towering cliffs almost shutting out the light of day, and the roar of the river and train increased by the echoing walls, the passage of this terrible gorge will never be forgotten. For miles we stood out on the lowest step of the train while passing through here, and so had a much better view of this wild but grand scenery. In some places the tops of pine trees just come up on a level with the track so that we could touch them with our hands. These of course were only growing part way up on the side of the canyon, while others grew further and still further down. Here is where you see "giants of the forest," covering the mountains to their very tops, until in the distance they appear like shrubs; the most beautiful forests one would wish to see.

Suddenly the train emerges into daylight. The broad river ahead is the Columbia, and the beautiful mountains lifting their ice-clad heads far into the sky are the Selkirks. We get discouraged as we feel it is impossible to give you anything like an idea of the beauty of this pass as we follow the windings of the river. In places it is clear and placid with the mountains mirrored as they rise in perpendicular walls from its bed, showing their red, blue, gray and white faces, according to their different constitutions. In some places great masses of fleecy clouds lying half way down their sides, in appearance like great bundles of wool with their gray rugged tops towering above, and their blue-black and purple bases below. About dark we arrive at the Glacier House station, so called from the great glacier which is only thirty minutes walk from the hotel. The hotel is a handsome structure belonging to the C.P.R. Co., with grounds rising in terraces from the railway track. It is now too dark for any more of this wonderful scenery to be seen. Before daylight we are in winter in the rockies, the snow being from three to four feet deep, and it is snowing, making the trees of the forest look beautiful in their white feathery covering. We have passed from spring into winter, and soon the more advanced spring a few hours later, with trees and flowers in bloom. We are now in the midst of snow sheds. They are massive wooden tunnels, so that between them and tunnels through the rocks we are almost in utter darkness, just here and there getting glimpses of daylight. However, about 9 o'clock a.m. we have reached the rich and fertile valley of the Thompson and Fraser rivers, and are pleased to see thrifty farm houses, ... fields in full bloom, and fields of grass and grain. First the windings of the Thompson and then the Fraser rivers are followed, with the foot hills on either side. Here and there Indian and Chinamen's ... grouped along the ... of the river. The former are very often seen ... spearing salmon. Here we passed an old Indian with a bundle of the largest salmon we ever saw, tied to the side. The latter are seen ... salmon-bars washing for gold, which ... grow ... frequently seen ... the Chinese distinguishable ... day dress ... each other.

Weariness.

O little feet that such long years
Must wander on through hopes and fears,
  Must ache and bleed beneath your load;
I, nearer to the wayside inn,
Where toil shall cease and rest begin,
  Am weary thinking of your road.

O little hands! that, weak or strong,
Have still to serve or rule so long,
  Have still so long to give or ask;
I, who so much with book and pen
Have toiled among my fellow men,
  Am weary, thinking of your task!

O little hearts! that throb and beat
With such impatient, feverish heat,
  Such limitless and strong desires;
Mine that so long has glowed and burned,
With passions into ashes turned,
  Now covers and conceals its fires.

O little souls! as pure and white
And crystalline as rays of light
  Direct from heaven, their source divine;
Refracted through the mist of years,
How red my setting sun appears,
  How lurid looks this soul of mine!

All-Powerful Woman.

What cannot woman do for good or evil?
  She is the worst and best of human kind—
Either an angel or a very devil.
  Sour and belligerent, or calmly sweet inclined.
As wife and mother she can make home heaven,
  Or bring upon it suffering and blight—
By disposition kind and temper even,
  Or bosom full of bitterness and spite.

The sweetest, grandest object in creation
  Is a good woman in her proper sphere,
Winning the ardent love and approbation
  Of loyal husband and of children dear.
Earnest in her work, devout, untiring—
  Ever striving some new bliss to plan—
To no great name but that of wife aspiring—
  The crowning glory God vouchsafed to man.

And then, per contra, there is no one living
More to be censured, dreaded and despised
Than a bad woman, constant trouble giving
To those who should by her be idolized.
Splenetic, sour, cruel and seditious,
  Careless of home, and fond of rout and ball,
Wilful, improvident, conscienceless and vicious,
The friend of no one and the curse of all.

ESTELLE'S INFATUATION:

A NOVEL.

CHAPTER XI.

THE PRECIOUS BALMS.

"I heard you say you wanted to speak to me, Mrs. Medlicott," said Lady Elizabeth, with perfect composure. "You spoke so that we could hear all you said, as I presume you intended we should. And I heard this. What is it you want to say to me?"

Anne was taken aback. Between her new dignity as a married woman, making her superior to Lady Elizabeth in her state of unfledged maidenhood, and her natural veneration for the grand young lady of her old home between this natural veneration and her moral reprobation of Lady Elizabeth's consorting with Estelle, she was for a moment in a chaotic condition, and did not quite know what to do. She wished to be at once respectful to the earl's daughter and severe to the associate of sinners, mindful of the claims of rank while upholding those of morality; and the combination was difficult.

"I am so sorry to see you with that dreadful person, Lady Elizabeth; so sorry to hear you say 'we,'" then said Anne, taking a header into the depths,

"What person? Mrs. Harford or Mr. Stagg?" asked the lady.

"Both," said Anne.

"Why?"

Lady Elizabeth asked this as tranquilly as if Estelle had never broken her marriage vows, and Caleb Stagg, the miner's son, were the Home Secretary at the least.

"Why? Oh, Lady Elizabeth, how can you ask such a thing!" cried Anne, roused out of fear by the strength of her anger. "You—you that we all look up to at Kingshouse you to be sitting there like an equal with a fallen woman and the common man who supports her! And then you say 'why?' when a person like myself objects."

"That you are free from her special sin I know," said Lady Elizabeth, gently. "But are you so free from all sin, Mrs. Medlicott, that you can afford to be so severe? There is not only one kind of evil in the world; there are many kinds. Which of us is free from them all?"

"By George, no!" muttered Mr. Medlicott, forgetting his Orders and remembering his Varsity days.

"Oh, Lady Elizabeth!" cried Anne again, unutterably shocked, and not having heard her husband; "do you class running away from your husband and child, and living under a false name with another man as his wife, a sin no worse than telling a little falsehood now and then, or being a little cross or lazy, or ill-natured, or anything like that? It is dreadful! Where shall we all come to if we make no more distinction than this?"

"We should come to more charity than we have now," Lady Elizabeth answered.

"Laxity, you mean," put in Anne warmly.

"No, Christian charity," was the response. "That poor girl there is scarcely herself. Her grief has touched the fineness of her intellect, and she is scarcely responsible for what she says or does. Cannot you feel some kind of pity for a life so wasted, so wrecked, so unhappy?"

"No," said Anne. "She deserves it all, and more. We have no right to pity such wicked people as she and Mr. Osborne, for all that he is dead. They deserve to die. They ought to die, or go mad, or something, and not live to set a bad example to others, and to be pitied and made much of, as if they had done nothing to be ashamed of."

"Is this the Christianity you teach, Mr. Medlicott?" asked Lady Elizabeth, turning to Anne's uncomfortable husband, standing there in the trimmer's distress, wishing to restrain his Annette's rude testifying, yet not wishing to fail the severe dignity of his cloth.

"It is always difficult to reconcile Christian charity with Christian purity," he said, smoothly. Who felt that difficulty more acutely than he?

"Our Lord pardoned sinners," was Lady Elizabeth's commentary.

"Because He was our Lord, and had the right and the power. But we frail, fallible mortals are different. We must hold the standard of purity high, and keep the light of the lamp undimmed. We must not be too pitiful to the sinners lest we should forget to hate the sin. 'To condemn cards and pardon the sharper,' you know, is absurd, Lady Elizabeth. But this is the danger of too great leniency—too great compassion for the evil-doer."

This he said as his confession of faith for Anne's sake, not deeming it wise to be less exacting for purity than his young wife, having always before him the dread of weakening those bonds of restraint which men loosen for their pleasure out of the home, and draw tight for their security within it.

"Yet the very life and spirit of the gospels is charity; and the Apostles too taught the same sweet truth," said Lady Elizabeth.

"Not to women who run away from their husbands with other men, and leave their children to be brought up anyhow by strangers," persisted Anne, coming back to her point as a cat comes back to the mouse-hole. "If Mrs. Harford had wanted to leave her husband—and that would have been wicked enough when once she had married him—she need not have gone off with Mr. Osborne. If she did not love the man she married, she could at least have kept herself correct," she added, with unanswerable justice.

"I do not defend Estelle's action, but we must remember the whole circumstance before we can judge it rightly," Lady Elizabeth answered. "She had loved Charlie Osborne all her life. She was induced to marry Mr. Harford only after she had been deceived by a false report of his death; and when she saw her old lover again she went away with him on the spur of the moment—not after thought and deliberation. It was not like loving a stranger after marriage. It was more like going back to her own."

"Then," said Anne, hotly, "you hold that a girl is justified in going back to her own, as you call it—that is, in leaving her husband for her first love if he happens to cross her path. Is that what you mean to say, Lady Elizabeth? I can scarcely believe it of you—you, of all people in the world!"

"I do not quite say that," was the quiet reply. "You have overstated me, Mrs. Medlicott. I only excuse poor Estelle somewhat, not only because of her long and deep-rooted attachment, but because she had been, as it were, betrayed into her marriage with a man she did not love. And it seemed more natural to her to give her life to Mr. Osborne, the man she did love."

"All this is dreadful!" cried Anne, aghast. "And her marriage vows to go for nothing! Whatever she felt she should have borne it. Had she not vowed that she would?"

"We are frail creatures under temptation," said Lady Elizabeth.

"And we should be frailer if such principles as these were accepted," cried Anne. "That I should have lived to hear such awful sentiments from Lady Elizabeth Inchbold! It is fearful! And the earthquake here so lately! I wonder you have the courage, Lady Elizabeth! I wonder you are not afraid!"

She was sincerely stirred. She wore the White Cross on her breast; and charity to evil-doers was as a black stain thrown across its virgin purity. Tears stood in her china blue eyes—genuine tears of genuine distress. That the sweet lady of Kingshouse should advocate laxity in these matters was a species of blasphemy which terrified and overcame her. She had always looked up to Lady Elizabeth with so much reverence, if her practical democracy had at times somewhat revolted her. But, now, when she was not only consorting with sinners, but speaking gently of that fallen creature, and even excusing her and making light of the heinousness of her sin, Anne felt as if she must choose between man and God—human respect and divine guidance.

"Some day you will come to a better knowledge," she said, with quivering lips. "I will pray that you do."

"Perhaps some day, taught by the lesson of suffering in the world, you will think with me—gently of sinners," said Lady Elizabeth in reply.

"I hope never!" said Anne, with fervor.

"But you can at all events refrain from saying harsh things that she can hear. You remember the bruised reed and the smoking flax!" said Lady Elizabeth. "She is very, very sad—her mind is a little unhinged—will you not spare her this pain, this indignity?"

"If she were in a proper frame of mind, and truly repentant, I would," Anne answered. "But she is not, and she ought to be made to see her sin as it is. She is not really mad, I suppose? She can pray, can she not? and God can give His grace even to an idiot, if He will!"

"Then let God judge her. We have only to soothe and help her," Lady Elizabeth replied, as she turned away and went back to Estelle.

"What has she been saying to you? What have you been talking about all this time?" were Estelle's two questions, put rapidly and feverishly on her friend's return.

"Nothing of consequence," said Lady Elizabeth. "We had a great deal to talk about that meant nothing and ended in nothing."

"A bitter, black-hearted rigmaree, that's what she is!" muttered Caleb to himself, chafing at his own inability to help and avenge Estelle by telling Mrs. Medlicott what he thought of her. "Not fit to hold a candle to her, isn't she, and she daring to drag her over the coals like that! She wants coaling herself, that does she!"

"I know why Anne Aspline hates me so much," then said Estelle, after a pause. "It is because mother would not visit them; and now that she is properly married, and I was not, she is glad to insult me. It is very simple."

"Yes," said Lady Elizabeth, almost scared by the unwonted lucidity of her poor friend's words.

"But I do not care," continued Estelle, "for I did only what was right. It was my duty to Charlie when he wanted me, and I went. I did quite right. Did I not, Liese dear? I was quite right to leave Thrift, which I always hated—oh, how I hated that place!—and come to the Riviera with my poor darling when he wanted me, was I not?"

"We will not discuss that now, dear," said Lady Elizabeth, weakly trafficking with her conscience for love's sake.

"But I want to discuss it!" said Estelle, with a child's wilfulness. "And I want you to tell me, yes or no. Did I do wrong to go with Charlie when he wanted me? I was engaged to him long before I ever saw Mr. Harford; and when I knew that he was alive and he said I was to go to him, of course I did. What else could I do?—and why should I not? And I did what was right, did I not?"

"Whether I think you did right or wrong is nothing to either of us," said Lady Elizabeth. "My best answer is, 'I am here to care for you and help you to get quite well.'"

"But that dreadful girl who hates me so much has said such dreadful things!" said Estelle.

"Forget them, dear. While you have such friends as Mr. Stagg and myself, let the rest go."

"And my darling, who never leaves me!" said Estelle, softly, looking up into the blue vault above, where she did really and honestly believe Charlie, as a spirit, was hovering, having postponed his entrance into his inheritance of heaven to be near her.

"And Mr. Harford, who wishes you only well," said Lady Elizabeth, tentatively.

"Oh," was the weary response, "do not talk of him. He is nothing to me, and I want to forget him. I have only one wish—that he will divorce me; and then I shall be all Charlie's—all—all his—body, soul, and name!"

"And he of no more value than a bit of mouse-ear chickweed," thought Caleb Stagg to himself. "And that queenly lass to have given herself away for a man not fit to tie her very shoe-string! Matty me! the pity of it all!"

After this rude blow, however, Estelle's mind went back to its clouded state, and she lost more than she had ever found of clearness and self-consciousness. Charlie had died sooner than need have been from the same cause; and Anne had, indeed, vindicated the claims of stern justice and righteous retribution. And now it had come Estelle's turn, and her fibre proved no tougher than her dead lover's. Not all Lady Elizabeth's loving care, not all Caleb's humble devotion, counteracted the shock of Anne's scorn. She passed whole days by Charlie's grave, and obstinately refused to go anywhere else. Anthony was still unable to move, and Mrs. Clanricarde would not come; and Lady Elizabeth had to be strong enough for the place, however painful its circumstances and onerous its duties. The nurse hired to share the anxieties of the moment was worse than useless. Estelle would not have her near her, and her very presence made the poor girl so violent that she was perforce put into the background, while Lady Elizabeth's maid was a timid young woman who had nerves of her own, and was afraid of her own shadow. Thus the sweet Lily of Kingshouse had it all in her hands and on her shoulders; and sometimes she wished that she could divide the burden with another.

One day she had a more than usual strain. It was hot and stifling and she fell asleep by Estelle, lying on her bed near her and holding her hand in hers. When she awoke she found herself alone. Estelle had crept away with that wonderful cunning of the partially insane, and stolen from the house unseen of any. Caleb happened to be out of the way at the moment, and the coast was therefore clear. There was hot running and feverish excitement—messengers were sent off in various directions—and a considerable stir was made in the hotel—when Estelle reappeared, as from a walk, bright-eyed, flushed, brisk, alert; far more so because more feverish than she ever was in her best days, and no more like an invalid than Lady Elizabeth herself. When gently scolded by Lady Elizabeth, and asked where she had been and why she had given them all this trouble and anxiety, she laughed in a buoyant way, and said she had been out for a little walk; the day was so fine, and she had a longing to be alone. So the escapade passed without more notice being taken of it, and Lady Elizabeth did not know what it was that her charge held hidden in her breast—something which every now and then she touched as if to reassure herself it was there, and safe in her own possession.

CHAPTER XII.

HOW THEY MET AND PARTED.

One of the difficulties of the present position was Estelle's obstinate refusal to leave Mentone, where Charlie was buried, and where his spirit still lived. There was no doubt that she ought to be taken away. The only chance of mental rehabilitation was in change of scene and diversion of thought; but who could insist when she so passionately and so tempestuously refused? Lady Elizabeth had neither the nerve nor the power to carry a shouting and protesting maniac to the station; and if she had not, then certainly had Caleb even less than she. Left alone and not thwarted, Estelle was quiet enough, if not always amenable to control; but to be taken forcibly away would have roused into active mania what was now that dulled and brooding condition known technically as "melancholia."

Anthony could not come for yet awhile, and Mrs. Clanricarde would not, till certain toilette arrangements were completed. Lady Elizabeth confessed that Estelle was in perfect physical health, which was so far a relief. If her mind had gone a little astray, it would come right in time, and there was nothing to fear. Ever since that first (false) announcement of Charlie's death she had been warped and strained; but she had done no harm to herself or any other, and would not now. A few days more or less did not signify, and a perfect equipment did. So the mother contented herself with a few letters full of futile excuses to Lady Elizabeth, and waited until her cloaks and bonnets and gowns should be sent home fit to wear.

But Estelle did not want her at all. Her one cry to Lady Elizabeth was: "Keep my mother away, Liese! She would send me mad if she came! She was too wicked to my darling! I will never see her again."

Meanwhile, Anthony's broken bone was healing apace, and would soon be well enough for him to take the journey with due care and precautions. And, after all, he was the proper person to come and make arrangements. He was the very one who had legal authority to act—the only one who could dispose of this poor wrecked life, or say what should be done with this more than widow and less than wife.

It was one of Estelle's bad days, when the working of her brain was even more than usually impeded. She was lying in bed, having refused to get up; and was in that state of semi-unconsciousness so well known to the watchers by these mournful bedsides. Her eyes were closed, and she was silent and impassive.

While she was standing there, her main desire at this moment being that Estelle should rouse herself enough to take some soup, Lady Elizabeth heard the omnibus from the station clatter through the gates and draw up at the hotel door. Then she heard a voice she knew only too well, and a strange halting sound, like and yet unlike a human step, which came up the stairs and stopped at the door of their salon. A moment after, Anthony Harford, on crutches, stumbled into the room into which Estelle's bedroom opened, to find only Caleb sitting rather in the shadow, listening for any sound that might seem to ask his assistance, while apparently occupied in verifying certain flowers got that morning in his early walk before Estelle had stirred or Lady Elizabeth was visible. When Anthony came in, he started up in mingled trepidation and yet relief. Now that queenly lass would be lost to him, and his days would be as days without sun or sky, but Lady Elizabeth would be relieved from the anxiety which was beginning to tell on her rather heavily. How Estelle would bear this meeting remained to be seen. He hoped much, but he feared more. Had he had the ordering of things, and she could have been content, he would have liked to carry her away to some distant place where no one should see her more, or to have the care of her here at Mentone with the full consent of all belonging to her. He knew, he said to himself, that he could manage her. If he might do so he would, and could make her almost happy. But his doing as he would was only absolute submission to every wish or fancy of hers and to manage her was merely to adore her and obey her.

White, wan, and lean, Anthony was but the shadow of his former self. He looked as if he had been drained by some vampire of all his blood, as if the day of his final reckoning had come. But his changed appearance was due more to mental distress than physical discomfort, and the anguish of the moment was in pain of this meeting and the doubt of himself that it included. But this fellow, this creature, this usurper, roused the man's pride and passion, and, so far, did him good.

"Who are you, and what are you doing here?" he asked, haughtily, speaking to Caleb as to a dog.

"I am Caleb Stagg, from Kingshouse, and I am here to help Lady Elizabeth look after Mrs. Harford," said Caleb, with a quiet patience that was in its own way dignity.

"Where is she?" returned Anthony, still speaking in the same rude, rough way. For, indeed, it wounded him sore to see this man here where he should have been, and would, now that the villain who had wrought all this evil was dead, had it not been for this untoward accident.

"In yonder," said Caleb, pointing to a door that stood ajar. "Lady Elizabeth is there with her."

There was but one She for both these men, so unlike as they were and with such different claims; and for all her grandeur and goodness and charm and self-devotion the sweet Lily of Kingshouse was but the satellite where this other was the central star.

Estelle, with her eyes still shut and her lips drawn close, seemed to hear and know nothing. Lady Elizabeth, her nerves strung and her senses all intensified, heard and knew all. It was as if she were in the room and saw as well as heard—Anthony's impatience, just touching on brutality; Caleb's self-control, that rose into dignity. She came through the doorway, laying her finger on her lip, and as she turned, Estelle opened her eyes wide with a strange and ah! for the lost beauty of mind which goes with the health of the brain!—vicious smile, and touched something that was in the thick coils of her hair. Then she closed her eyes again and lay as still as before.

"Speak softly," said Lady Elizabeth, making no more formal greeting. "She is easily startled."

"Let me see her," said Anthony, his brow drawn low, his lips pressed close. "I will not frighten her."

Lady Elizabeth, moving softly, went into the room, and Anthony prepared to follow her. But his crutches fell sharply on the uncarpeted floor, and he stopped, with an angry exclamation.

"Let me help you, Mr. Harford, sir," said honest Caleb, coming forward with all his kindly nature roused to be of service to a fellow-man, but, above all, to be of service to one who loved her. "Lean on me for this side, and maybe one stick will be enough for the other. It will make less clatter."

"Thanks, yes," said Anthony, with by no means effusive gratitude for the service rendered. Man-like, he was totally without gratitude for small services of temporary usefulness. Large ones he would pay back with his life, if need be. But to lean on Caleb's shoulder did not soften his heart to the ungainly interloper who had taken the place that should have been his; and he went on into the room where Estelle was lying, mutely cursing his fate and all humanity with the passion and injustice of his unregenerate kind. As they came up to the bedside and looked at that poor beautiful wreck—a more sorrowful victim of love than ever was Ophelia—Caleb felt the strong man leaning on him quiver like an aspen leafe in the wind; but he made no open demonstration. He neither groaned nor wept, nor yet spoke. He only trembled with the suppressed emotion of a passionate man used to control expression, and lightly laid his hand on hers.

Then Estelle, opening her eyes wide, fixed them on the faces of the two men standing by the side of her bed—Anthony in the full light and Caleb in the shadow—and as she looked she shrieked and covered her face in her hands.

"Estelle, dear, do you know me?" said Anthony, very gently, bending over her; but she only shuddered and moaned, shutting out the sight as something too painful, too terrible to be borne.

"Will you not speak to me, Estelle? Dearest! are you afraid of me? There is nothing to fear! Darling, speak to me. Oh, my love! look at me once more with those dear eyes and tell me you do not hate me!"

He said all this at intervals, softly, his passion, his despair of entreaty, rising as the time went by and she still hid her face and moaned.

"One word, my Estelle!" continued Anthony, who, by now, had lost all memory of her sin and of his own anger and dark resolves—whose heart had gone back to her again with all its former integrity of love and who determined that, come what might, he would take her in his hand before the world, and rehabilitate her by his love. He was man enough to face the world and overcome it. "One word!" he pleaded; "tell me that you are glad I have come, and that you will go back with me to Thrift and your child!" He forcibly took her hand from her face—that long, soft, perfumed hand—and carried it to his lips. "Oh, my darling! will you not speak to me one word!" he said, with a sob. "Not one look to the man who loves you!"

Then Estelle uncovered her face and looked at him with sudden gentleness.

"Poor Anthony, do not cry," she said, simply.

He kissed her hand again. Judge and criminal—it was the judge who sued and the criminal who granted.

"But I have found you now, and we will be happy together again," he said, his very soul in his voice.

She shuddered visibly, and looked appealingly at Lady Elizabeth. Her one conscious thought was to stay here, where Charlie's grave held Charlie's heart, and was the altar where she worshipped.

"Do you want to see your boy?" then asked Anthony; "your little son? He has grown now, Estelle; he is a big boy, and remembers you. We teach him to speak of you—to ask after you. He has not forgotten you. Do you not wish to see him again?"

"No," sighed Estelle. "He was yours, not mine. He is better without me."

Tears gathered into Anthony's eyes. Hers were dry. If she could have wept, she would have been saved.

"How can a child be better without its mother?" he said, tenderly. "How much better he will be with you, you mean, my darling! How we are all longing for you again!"

Again she shuddered.

"Ask Anne Aspline," she said.

A Plea for the Denominations.

The best men in every congregation—the men who work best, train their families best, pay most, make most sacrifices, attend public worship and prayer meeting most regularly, and are most influential for good in the community—are, without exception, the men most attached to the doctorines and polity of their own churches. This is true of every denomination. The men who have most influence in the community, the men who have most influence in other churches are invariably the men who work best on their own denominational lines. Over against this undoubted fact put the other undoubted fact that the man who never has any influence for good in his own church or in any other is the rounder who gr8hes about union.

DR. T. HEMAN BREHMER, an eminent German authority, says: "Consumption is always due to deficient nutrition of the lungs, caused by bad blood." At the Brompton Hospital for consumptives, London, Eng., a statement has been published that 52 per cent. of the patients of that institution have unsuspected kidney disorder. This explains why the proprietors of Warner's Safe Cure claim that they have received many testimonials which they have not published, because of the incredulity with which they would be received were it claimed that Warner's Safe Cure cures consumption. But the fact is that if your kidneys be cured and put in a healthy condition they expel the uric acid and poisonous waste matter, and prevent the irritation of the delicate substances of the lungs, thereby removing the cause. When the effect is removed the symptom of kidney disease, which is called consumption, disappears, and with it the irritation which caused it.

OUT IN THE STORM.

The Barge Bavaria Driven Ashore in Monday Night's Gale.

EIGHT OF THE CREW DROWNED.

Exciting Experiences of the Tows of the D. D. Calvin and Tecumseth.

A last (Wednesday) night's Kingston despatch says: In the great gale of yesterday the D. D. Calvin's tow was broken up off Long Point. The D. D. Calvin and the schooners Norway and Valentia reached Garden Island more or less filled with water and minus their deck loads of timber. The Bavaria, the third of the tow, was driven ashore and all her crew, eight in number, drowned. The Valentia was next to the D. D. Calvin, and she broke her tow line about fifteen miles from Long Point. Immediately afterwards the Bavaria broke her line. The Valentia broached to and became water-logged. The sea was running high and tons of water were thrown on deck, smashing the bulwarks, washing overboard blocks of timber and opening up the covering board. The seas also carried away the chain plate of the rigging and did much damage in the cabin. The Bavaria is ashore on the north side of the Gallops Island, but can easily be got off. There was no trace of the crew about when Capt. O'Brien, of the Armenia, visited the vessel. In the cabin are all of Captain Marshall's clothes and papers, which led Captain O'Brien to believe that he had been washed overboard. Some of the large timber which formed part of her cargo had been washed on the cabin. The Armenia passed a ship's boat, bottom up, a short distance from where the ill-fated Bavaria is ashore. The crew were as follows: Captain, John Marshall; first mate, Felix Campau; second mate, John Snell; seamen, W. Owens, Elias King, Arthur Bowean, Alex. Berry; cook, Bella Hartman.

The theory is that Capt. Marshall, in attempting to shift the timber to lighten the Bavaria, was washed overboard, when the crew took to the boat and were upset. The order of the Calvin's tow was: Valentia, Bavaria and Norway. About 6 o'clock, when the gale was at its worst, the tow line broke, and the Bavaria, drifting back, broke the head gear of the Norway. The Norway at once cut her tow line and made sail, but the Bavaria got into the trough of the sea and couldn't get out. The Calvin hung on to the Valentia, which had a big sheer on, and was trying to get her into line when her tow line parted. Within three-quarters of an hour from the time of leaving the Bavaria, the Calvin returned abreast of her, blowing her whistle, but could perceive no one on board. So the crew must have left her or been washed overboard. The Calvin went back three or four times, but they did not see a sign of life on the vessel. The Calvin waited around the Bavaria until she drifted to the head of Duck Island; when, satisfied that nothing more could be done, the Calvin took the Valentia in tow and arrived at Garden Island at 7 this morning. The lighthouse man at Point Peter Lighthouse says he perceived a boat with several men in it a good way out. It was upset. Afterwards he saw one man on the bottom of the boat, who was eventually washed off. This must have been the man whom the captain of the Tecumseth saw. Permission will have to be received from Washington before a Canadian tug can go to the rescue. The Valentia finally anchored four miles above the False Ducks. The Valentia last sighted the Bavaria between the Main Ducks and the Gallop. She was water-logged. The Norway, which was picked up by the steamer Armenia and towed to this port, suffered terribly. Of her cabin not a whole stick remains. Besides the actual walls, which were saved by timber which surrounded them, inside are doors, windows, tables, frames, crockery, boots, clothing, papers, etc. Her decks and hatches are broken and bulwarks smashed.

Captain Smith said: "About 5.30 a.m. on Tuesday morning, after the Bavaria broke loose, I cut my tow line, in order to keep out of the trough of the sea, which was running high. I never experienced a worse night. I set a little canvas and made the Ducks, four miles from Nine Mile Point. She waterlogged. The cabin was smashed, and mostly everything was washed overboard. We stopped on top of the deck house and in the rigging. We were in this condition from 9 o'clock in the morning until towed into Garden Island by the Armenia, which could not take us on board on account of the heavy sea."

The Norway's crew last saw the Bavaria about half way between the Main Ducks and the Gallop, drifting waterlogged. The Bavaria was built ten years ago at Garden Island. Captain James Marshall was married and had three children. Felix Campau, first mate, has a wife and eight children, residing on Garden Island. John Snell, the second mate, was a son of Mrs. Snell, of Garden Island. Samuel Berry, deck hand, was the son of a farmer near Barriefield. Owens and two Frenchmen were single.

It was off Brighton on Tuesday morning that the tow-line of the barge Cameron, one of the consorts of the steam barge Tecumseth, snapped, and the barges Cameron and J. G. Worts had to shift for themselves. The Cameron threw the tow-line of the Worts overboard. The wind was blowing ferociously and the waves were rolling mountains high. Canvas was spread by the vessels, and they came flying down the lake. Both of the barges reached port safely, the Cameron losing her big anchor, which she dropped in the bay. It was this side of Long Point that the sailors discovered the steamer D. D. Calvin parted from her consorts. The sailors on the Tecumseth's tow declare that they beheld one man clinging to a stick of timber. He was struck by every wave, and there was little hope that he could long survive or be picked up. Another man was holding on to an upturned yawl. He waved for help, but the barges could not turn. The captain of the Cavalier saw a man clinging with both hands to an unturned yawl. He was satisfied that it was Captain Marshall. As the boat passed the captain waved his hat, but the Cavalier's crew could not get near him. Another man was sitting upon a stick of timber. This was near the barge Bavaria. On the Valentia four men were seen aft and one in the rigging. Men on going to the Bavaria found her hold half full of water. The furniture of Captain Marshall's room was in good order. There was money in a drawer and his books were all right. The captain was an Odd-fellow and very recently was insured for $1,000 in the Odd-fellows' Relief Association. The name of the cook, who is supposed to be lost, is Bella Asselatine.

The beauty of the wrecking laws of Canada is alarmingly shown. Two barges and the schooner Bavaria are ashore at Long Point and cannot be touched without orders from Ottawa and Washington. Meantime the vessels may pound themselves to pieces. Mr. Henry Folger has asked Washington to allow the Bavaria to be saved by Canadian tools, and orders are being awaited. The advantages of the recent Wrecking Bill, killed by the Senate, are now most apparent.

The Sylvester Neelon sprang a leak off the Ducks. At once the pumps were set in motion. The sea broke over her and several of her crew narrowly escaped being washed overboard. The vessel reached port with seven feet of water in her. The crew did not have time to eat for twenty-four hours. The Beals and Rhoda Emily lay under Four-Mile Point all day yesterday. None of Calvin & Sons' vessels are insured. The Calvin and tow came from St. Ignace with timber. The Valentia came in with her starboard bulwark nearly to the water's edge. The Valentia had 4,300 feet of timber in her cargo. It was piled nearly nine feet high on her deck. The Calvin had a deck load eleven feet high. The forward hatch of the Valentia was not put on, owing to the position of the timber.

"BUFFALO TO THE BEYOND."

A Third Suicide for the Week—This One Dangles from a Rope's End.

During the week three weary wanderers on life's thorny thoroughfare have passed from Buffalo to the beyond by swinging from this world into the next at the end of a rope. Third on the list was Peter Reinhart, who hung himself from the ceiling of his sitting-room at No. 254 Cedar street yesterday afternoon. Reinhart was 67 years old, and for three months had been suffering from rheumatism. He had a wife and four married children. One member of the household was a niece, who, with the other members of the family, went out calling yesterday afternoon, leaving Reinhart in the house alone. On returning the niece was first to enter the sitting-room, and was startled at seeing her uncle dangling from the centre of the ceiling by a clothesline attached to a hook. Sergt. Bodamer of the Fourth Precinct cut the body down.—Buffalo Courier of to-day.

An Old Soldier's Grit.

A pitiful illustration of the determination and grit animating the old soldiers of the Confederacy was witnessed in the Governor's office recently. Mr. John M. Varnadoe, of Telfair county, came in on crutches to apply for a pension. His left leg was off above the knee, his right foot was stiffened out perfectly straight and his hands were very rough and horny. Mr. Varnadoe is an illiterate farmer, and being unable to write his name made his cross mark to the application. After he received his order for $150 he was asked by Capt. Tip Harrison what he could do toward making a living. He replied that he could do anything on a farm that any other man could do. He sat down on the floor and showed how he chopped cotton, propelling himself along the row by means of his hands. He also cut wood by sitting down to it, and on one occasion cut and split 130 rails in a day. He dug the well on his place and reshingled his house. Mr. Varnadoe has a wife and eight children, and seems as happy and contented as most men, notwithstanding his crippled condition.—Atlanta Journal.

An Infamous Bill, Indeed.

A day or two after the division on the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill I was talking to an hereditary legislator who had taken part in it. "Vote against it!" he exclaimed, with every appearance of intense indignation; "of course I did! An infamous Bill! I would oppose it at any sacrifice." "But why do you feel so strongly about it, my friend?" I asked. "Strongly? Why, because I regard it as an utterly unjustifiable outrage to compel a man to marry a woman whom he possibly detests." This poor creature really thought the Bill proposed to render marriage with a deceased's wife's sister compulsory. I daresay that there were many more of them in the lobby who had equally hazy views on the subject.—London Truth.

LATEST CRONIN SENSATION.

Other Two Suspected Murderers in Custody.

HISTORY OF THE CASE.

The Untouched "Charm" on the Person of the Dead Man.

Notwithstanding Chief Hubbard's statement it is reported that two other Cronin suspects are in jail.

"AGNUS DEI."

A correspondent writes in the New York Sun: Doubtless some persons who have read in to-day's Sun about the Agnus Dei said to have been found on the corpse of Dr. Cronin may want to know what it is, its meaning and purpose. It must not be confounded with a scapular, which is a different thing. It is a small cake of wax taken from that which remains from the paschal candles, is stamped with the figure of a lamb supporting the banner of the cross, and is solemnly blessed by the Pope on the Thursday after Easter. In the ninth century Agnus Deis were made of wax and oil by the Archdeacon of Rome, blessed by the Pope, and distributed to the people on the octave of Easter. It is forbidden to paint or gild an Agnus Dei. They are usually sewn up in a covering of silk in the shape of a heart, and are never for sale. They belong to what is known in the Catholic Church as sacramentals and as such, if worn with pious dispositions, they excite increased fear and love of God, detestation of sin, and so, not in themselves, but because of those movements of the heart toward God, remit venial sins.

ONLY A MISCHIEVOUS FAKE.

The story published in the morning papers to the effect that Dr. Cronin was removed by order of the Clan na-Gael upon the charge that he was suspected to be a spy is emphatically denounced by friends of Dr. Cronin, who declare it to be an inspiration of the enemy.

"I tell you that that story comes from Dr. Cronin's enemies, said a prominent Irishman to an Evening News reporter this morning. "It is a part of the conspiracy to blacken the doctor's memory and to confuse the public mind. He was not suspected of being a spy. Le Caron's testimony never directed suspicion against him. The Clan-na-Gael never ordered any such trial as that described, and no order to remove him ever came from any meeting of that organization. Dr. Cronin was assassinated by personal enemies, who conspired to remove him because he was in their way. This story is an unspeakable outrage on his memory and a damnable plot to mislead pursuit. It is inspired by the same parties who befogged the case from the first by lying reports of every description, from the story that he was seen here on a street car to the tale about his being in Toronto at a hotel."

Other Irishmen expressed the same view of the matter, and some of them were hot at the newspapers for giving the story currency.

CRONIN'S MURDER CONDEMNED.

The Municipal Council of the Irish National League met in New York last night and passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That we, the members of the Municipal Council of the Irish National League, most emphatically condemn the brutal murder of Dr. P. H. Cronin. We repudiate the calumnies that seek in any way to hold the Irish National League, its funds or its policy as in the slightest degree connected with this assassination. Deploring this great crime, we express our earnest hope that swift justice will overtake all those responsible for his death.

THE MEN AND THE CRIME.

As the days go by the evidence of the conspiracy becomes more and more apparent. The police have now got all the scraps of evidence into something like an intelligible shape. The puzzle is becoming clearer and when a few missing pieces are supplied he who runs may read. All who wish to try to solve the puzzle should look at these few facts. First, take the mere sequence of events and see how one fits into the other to prove the plot. Here is the chain of events:

CHRONOLOGY OF THE PLOT.

Feb. 10—A room is hired by "J. B. Simmons at No. 117 Clark street, directly opposite Cronin's office, whence his every movement could be watched.
Feb. 21—"Simmons" buys furniture and a trunk, which are taken to his room.
March 19—"Simmons'" room is found unoccupied and all his furniture taken away.
March 20—Frank Williams, thought to be J. B. Simmons, hires a little house in Lakeview from the Carlsons.
April 20—P. O. Sullivan, ice dealer, living near Carlsons, has a large number of cards printed.
May 1—Sullivan makes a contract with Cronin by which latter is to attend ice dealer's men whenever one of these cards is sent to him.
May 4—Cronin is sent for to attend one of Sullivan's men and is never seen alive again by his friends. Subsequently his friends made inquiries, and reports were received from various cities that Cronin had been seen alive, but his friends insisted that he had been made away with.
May 5—A bloody trunk is found in Lakeview.
May 10—Charles Long claims to have talked with Cronin in Toronto.
May 11—F. T. Woodruff is arrested for horse stealing, and says that on the night of May 4th he was hired to take a trunk out of Chicago, and that it contained the body of a woman. He added that Cronin was present when he took the body away.
May 22—The body of Dr. Cronin, bearing marks of a fearful crime, found in a sewer in Lakeview.
May 24—It is discovered that the house in Lakeview hired by Frank Williams was the scene of the murder. The trunk is identified as that bought in February by J. B. Simmons. The furniture in the house was also bought by him at the same time and moved before March 19th from the rooms in Clark street. Daniel Coughlin, a detective, is suspected of complicity, or at least of trying to lead the police off the scent.
May 26—King, described by Woodruff as an accomplice, captured in a disorderly house.
May 27—Several other suspects are arrested, but nothing new of any importance is discovered. P. O. Sullivan arrested. King discharged; not the King wanted.
May 28—Coughlin, Iceman Sullivan and Woodruff indicted by the grand jury for murder.
May 29—Woodruff confesses to having driven the waggon with Dr. Cronin's body in it.

If one wishes to go further now, let him look at the list of men concerned in the whole terrible affair, and then he knows as much as the police, excepting many little details, and any one of which may, of course, lead to the detection of the murderers, but which are not necessary to a full understanding of the general story. Here they all are:

UNDER INDICTMENT.

COUGHLIN, DANIEL—Detective, who made arrangements for hiring of horse and buggy supposed to have been used by murderers.
SULLIVAN, P. O.—Iceman with whom Cronin had contract, and to visit whose men Cronin was lured away on fatal night.
WOODRUFF, F. T., alias BLACK—Horse-thief; drove waggon for murderers.

UNDER ARREST OR SURVEILLANCE.

JORDAN, HARRY—Of Philadelphia; a bartender at hotel where McGeehan lived; thought to have information of McGeehan's movements.
MCGEEHAN, PETER—Of Philadelphia; alleged to have been a spy upon Cronin and to have threatened to kill him; suspected of participating in crime.
SULLIVAN, A.M.—Irish leader of world-wide fame; ex-President of Land League in United States; watched by the police.
WHALEN—Detective; thought to have aided Coughlin in covering up crime; under surveillance.

WANTED BY POLICE.

SMITH, TOM—Said to have hired carriage in which body was removed.
WILLIAMS, FRANK, and his brother—Hired house in which murder was done.
SIMMONS, J. B.—Bought trunk in which body was removed, and the furniture found in the house.

All these three names are probably false.

FRAWLEY—Acted mysteriously in Chicago by some said to be Mezeroff, the dynamiter.
KING, W. L.—Accused by Woodruff of having hired him to drive waggon; a young man same name was arrested but discharged.

SHE LET ONE HUSBAND GO.

But Which of the Two Do You Suppose She Kept?

Miss Ackermann says that in Alaska the women have plurality of husbands. * * * Our fair lecturer, by mere coaxing and persuasion apparently—but not by Scriptural proof—persuaded this simple-minded Alaskan woman to effect a transformation in her domestic arrangements, and to dispense with one of her husbands. It is a significant fact though that she stuck to the young one.—Hawaiian Gazette.

Curious Condensations.

A gentleman living a few miles from Vienna, Ga., dreamed a few nights since that an alligator had him. He had often heard that if you would gouge them in the eyes they would turn you loose. So he proceeded to stick his thumbs into the 'gator's eyes. He awoke instantly from the scream of pain from his wife, when he found that he had almost put both her eyes out. She claims that he did it on purpose, and refuses to become pacified.

The youngest commercial drummer in the United States is Harry Wade, of Buffalo. He is but 12 years of age, and a son of Frank H. Wade. The way Master Wade first went out was owing to the serious illness of his father, who is now confined to his house. The boy had made frequent trips with his father, and observed his ways of doing business. He prevailed upon his father to let him take his route, which is through New York State. The boy has made two successive trips over the route, and is the favorite of the commercial men and his father's customers.

Thought the Girls Needed Washing.

A Waterville (Me.) despatch says: The President of Colby College acting under instructions of the trustees has expelled two freshmen and suspended till commencement two seniors said to have been the leaders in the hazing of some girl students. The hazing consisted of attracting the girls to their dormitories at night and then playing the hose on them. The escapade would have been passed over had not a highly-colored version of the affair been published in the newspapers, the girls having been greatly incensed at the notoriety given them. It is said, however, that all the girls except one, whose father is a trustee, were averse to having the matter referred to the faculty.

Save the Shade Trees.

The "borers" are doing a vast amount of damage in certain localities in killing off the maple trees. The remedy for the maple borer is to scrape the tree thoroughly with a dull hoe and clean out all the crevices with a knife, and wash the trees with an ounce of carbolic acid to four gallons of whitewash made of unslacked lime and water. One washing of this kind will not only kill all the larvæ already imbedded, but also it will prevent the operations of the aphis, that lays its eggs in the bark. This is a simple and effective remedy, and all those who have any regard for our lovely maples in the city and vicinity should see that any diseased trees are at once treated.

Information Wanted.

Secretary of the Navy—Say, what time should I plant tomatoes? I'm starting a garden.

Secretary of Agriculture—Hanged if I know. Ask the Secretary of State. He has a garden at home, I believe. Oh! by the way, my folks are very anxious to have a yacht, but I don't know whether to get a centre-board or not. What do you think about it?

Secretary of the Navy (meditatively)—Well, a centre-board might do, but I should think that bottles would be less likely to upset if kept in a side-board.

Customs Decisions.

The following decisions were rendered by the Dominion Board of Customs during April and May:

Patent carbon enamel, being a compound of fusil oil, etc., $1 90 per gallon.
Paris white, dry, 30 per cent.
Hoxie's mineral soap, 3 cents per lb. Adam's mineral soap, 3 cents per lb.
Bamboo curtains as furniture, 35 per cent.
Lemon squeezers, made wholly of glass, 30 per cent.
Stallion shields leather, 25 per cent.
Horse boots leather, 25 per cent.
Wire furrules, iron, steel or brass, 30 per cent.

A Trying Time for the Editor.

It is when the editor writes Nero and reads it hero in the paper that he is moved to pitch history in the fire and humbly accept the dictum that the dead past is past. —Fort Worth Gazette.

Poor Compensation.

It is painful to be poor, but even poverty has its compensations. The poor man generally is not bothered by his friends.—Somerville Journal.

Will Carleton says that he first took to writing poetry because a phrenologist told him that he had the right kind of bumps for it.

A TRIPLE LIFE.

With Painted Face, Yet a Good Samaritan, Though Buddhist.

Of the late Anna Bonus Kingsford, M.D., whose work on "Dreams and Dream Stories" has just been published, the Hartford Courant says: "It is a curious fact that Dr. Kingsford led a sort of triple existence. She was a sort of Bohemian of the Latin quarter in Paris where she lived, wrote articles to the American papers on cosmetics and fashions, and so far as her own personelle was concerned looked like a painted doll, her small, finely shaped head covered with yellow ringlets and her cheeks rouged to her darkened eyelids. This is one aspect. In the other she was a devoted attendant on the sick in the Paris Hospital and the guardian angel of the forlorn and outcast in whatever condition she found them. She was a Buddhist and a high authority among European converts to that faith. She believed, and her followers accepted it as a fact, that she was an incarnation of the spirits of Lady Jane Grey; and when she died a year ago, or took on another form of life, as they would say, royal insignia were placed in her coffin. She wrote several books on subjects relating to psychology, which had small circulation, but are regarded as the words of a seer by certain erratic minds."

Patrick Henry

uttered a sublime truth when he said, "It is natural for man to indulge in the illusions of hope. We are apt to shut our eyes against a painful truth and listen to that song of that siren till she transforms us into beasts." We are apt to shut our eyes while colds, catarrh or consumption are getting the better of us, hoping not, when our plain duty is to get some remedy like the Golden Medical Discovery of Dr. Pierce, and take it. We should not listen to the song of the siren, but rather heed Longfellow, who tells us to "Act, act in living present." That means before it is too late. The "Discovery" is one of the great successes of the age—a safe, pleasant remedy to take, and can be had of all druggists. It is guaranteed to benefit or cure, or money paid for it will be refunded.

Wants to Cross the Ocean in a Rowboat.

Dr. Bibby is a Bath physician with a queer hobby. He is anxious to have the ocean crossed in a rowboat. He sunk a round sum of money in fitting out a man for the voyage a few years ago, and the man was lost—at least he never has been heard from since he left the coast. The doctor's ardor is not dampened in the least, however. He says that to a stout man who hasn't chick or child dependent upon him and is willing to try the experiment, he will furnish a lifeboat that positively cannot tip over and all the supplies for the voyage.—Lewiston Journal.

Symptoms of Catarrh.

A profuse and many times excessively offensive discharge, with "stopping up" of the nose at times, impairment of the sense of smell and taste, watering or weak eyes, impaired hearing, irregular appetite, occasional nausea, pressure and pain over the eyes, and at times in the back of the head, occasional chilly sensations, cold feet and a feeling of lassitude and debility, are symptoms which are common to catarrh, yet all of them are not present in every case. Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy cures catarrh in its worst forms and stages. It is pleasant to use, and contains no poisonous or caustic drugs. Of druggists, for 50 cents.

Evidently in Earnest.

Gotham Dame—Do you think Mr. Nicefellow is in earnest? Daughter—I guess so. He asked me last evening which one of your daughters was your pet, and I told him that I thought if all three were married you would rather live with Clara or Dora than with me.

No Wonder She Envied Bridget.

A rich society lady told her servant, "I wish I could be as strong, healthy and full of life as you are." The lesson is plain. The girl had plenty of exercise, and constitutional health and contentment. Riches will not buy health always, but broken-down women can find sure relief in Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. It is a powerful, invigorating restorative tonic and nervine, and imparts strength to the whole system in general, and to the uterine organs and appendages in particular. For "run-down," debilitated and feeble women generally it is the greatest earthly boon.

Manuring Young Trees.

It is a common mistake to put too much manure around young trees. If the ground is reasonably rich none is needed the first season, and for several years after this potash will answer every requirement, especially if the soil be sandy. Through their leaves trees secure from the air the carbon which makes the bulk of the wood growth. All that passes off by bearing is carbon. When the tree gets to bearing manure will not hurt it. Before that time it will only cause too great a growth of wood for the tree to properly ripen. Too much manuring is the reason why many trees succumb to severe cold when they otherwise need not. The nitrogeneous manures from well-fed animals are more apt to stimulate excessive growth, making wood rather than fruit.

Death of William Hawk

One of the Old Landmarks of Wellesley Gone.

From the Berlin News

The deceased was born on the 13th of January 1825, in the township of Whitchurch, county York, and was at the time of his death in the 63rd year of his life.

The name "Hawk" was for many good & substantial reasons a household name in the township. Many a poor settler in the early history of Wellesley, has reason to cherish a kindly remembrance of the lantern, "Bill," over hard places, and the deceased was not behind any of the others in acts of generosity and disinterested benevolence to the poor and to those struggling to hew out a home in the wilds of the Queen's Bush. In fact, such was the benevolence of his nature that if he knew any person being in distress of any kind, he had no rest until what he could do to relieve that distress had been done. This disposition extended to the sick as well as the poor, and to this particular trait of his character it is utterly impossible in this brief sketch to do him anything like justice.

His parents belonged to what is known as the Society of Friends, more commonly called Quakers, and it was only too evident all through his life that many of the grand principles of this particular sect had been imparted to him in the early moral and religious training which he received at the hands of his devoted parents. And such were his convictions, that had there been a society of these people here, he would no doubt have identified himself with them. But failing this, and being surrounded with Methodistic influences, he some twenty or more years ago united with the Methodist Church, of which he continued an acceptable member and liberal supporter until his untimely death.

In politics he was a Liberal, always giving the Reform party an unflinching and generous support, and it is not too much to say that more than [illegible] representative of the [illegible] riding of the county of Waterloo could fairly attribute his election to the influence and unwearying exertions of the deceased. He was for several years a member of the municipal council of the township of Wellesley, and for the last twelve years of his life he was a director of the Waterloo Mutual Fire Insurance Co. and took a very active part in the direction of affairs and we feel sure that his absence at the future meetings of the Board will be much felt and deeply regretted.

He was twice married. First to Miss Jane Monkman July 5th, 1848, who bore him two sons and two daughters and died Oct. 24, 1857. On December 9th, 1858, he was again married to Miss Isabella Harrow, who survives him and who bore him eight sons and three daughters, all living but one daughter who died in infancy.

Being surrounded by a very numerous family he seemed to realize fully the obligations resting upon him to make the best possible provision for them in his power, and to accomplish this no labor or toil was too much [illegible] to secure a reasonable competency for [illegible] and those of his family not already provided for. He was a kind husband, a loving and affectionate father. It might be truly said that his life was one of devotion to his wife and children to his children especially for he was indulgent to a fault. He loved them much, and it is no flattery to say this unrestrained mutual position on his part was fully reciprocated by them. It is unnecessary to say that in his death his neighbors as well as his family feel that an irreparable loss has been sustained. His place cannot be filled.

The funeral on Monday was not only the largest that had ever been seen in this locality but was a highly representative gathering.

His body was enclosed in a very plain casket by six of his sons, Erastus, Edgar, Albert, George, Henry and Orval, to the [illegible] pall bearers. There was an entire absence of display on the exhibition of emblems of mourning all in conformity to the peaceful wishes of the deceased and it would be well indeed if this example this set should be followed in the future. After a short religious service at his late residence conducted by his minister Rev. John Pepper, B.A., his remains were followed to the Hawksville cemetery by a cortege of nearly 200 conveyances.

FRAUDS ON FARMERS

The Ontario Bureau of Industries has issued a bulletin dealing with "Frauds on farmers of Ontario." It is quite a lengthy resume of the question and should be in the hands of every farmer. Yet after all, there is but one sure way for the farmer to escape being caught by sharpers, and that is to deal with reliable men, with those whom you know to have a stake in the country's welfare and a reputation to maintain. Itinerant pedlars who are unknown to the farmer are always safe to shun. The necessities of life are always dealt in by your own merchants and there is no need to patronize foreign cheap Johns who have no object in retaining your patronage, and who, in nine cases out of ten, will fleece you to the last cent in their power. For years this idea of patronizing unknown pedlars has been decried and fought against by the Canadian press, and yet the crop of fools who never read the papers, or never profit by their counsel, grows and flourishes to such a extent that even the Governments have decided that it is important they should take a hand in the warning. A golden rule for every farmer to frame and hang in his brain is, never deal with any individual who does not come to you well recommended, or whose integrity you are not personally positive of. The crop of "sharks" would then grow beautifully less and the honest farmer reap the whole proceeds of his toil.

It is gratifying to learn that the loss of life in the Conemaugh Valley catastrophe was at first probably greatly overestimated. But the sudden destruction of even five or six thousand people, should the figures be happily brought so low, is a calamity sufficiently dreadful to demand the strictest investigation. Pending such inquest it is but fair to suspend judgment as to the guilt of individuals, but it now seems only too probable that the result will be found to have been due to the astounding carelessness or parsimony of the Club to which the artificial lake belonged, and for whose pleasure it was made and maintained. The Philadelphia record says that one prominent resident of Johnstown, who now mourns the loss of wife and daughter, was so convinced of the danger threatened by the reservoir that he had even tried legal measures to compel its removal, and had been laughed at as a "crank" for his pains; that an experienced engineer had, after careful examination, reported in unmistakable language that the dam was in an unsafe condition: and that one of the Club's watchmen had continued to warn the officers of the Club of the danger, until silenced by threats of dismissal. If these statements, in which names and particulars are given, can be substantiated, the officers of the South Fork Club will have to render a stern account to the laws of the State and to the bereaved survivors, and a still sterner one, it must be supposed, to their own consciences. The horrors of the event seem multiplied: one can almost fancy it a mocking representation in miniature of the great tragedy of human life, when it is remembered that, whether due to culpable negligence or not, the danger was created and the catastrophe brought about through the agency and for the gratification of a few pleasure seekers.—The Week.

OHIO TO GEORGIA.

Mr. W. H. Carruthres Tells About His Late Trip.

A letter from W. H. Carruthers, dated Cedartown, Georgia, and received three weeks ago, gives the following interesting information about his trip down there: Just as we leave the Union depot in Cincinnati, for Chattanooga, Tenn., by the Cincinnati Southern, the scenery is very picturesque. The route is across western Kentucky, and eastern Tennessee. There are high banks and slopes, with pretty cottages and mansions on the slopes and on top of the hills. But as we leave the city, in a few minutes we come to a rough country. The land is very rolling, with a continual succession of hills; no level land. The land here is not very good, but I think it is the fault of the farmers. They are not a very thrifty class of people. After we have gone about 60 miles we come to a comparatively level country—a very good farming section—until we pass Lexington which is 79 miles from Cincinnati. Soon again we come to a rough country—even worse than the first—very rocky in places. Little log huts are to be seen, and are occupied by the poor whites and colored people. When a hut begins to decay they build another along side of it, and I have seen three huts, each worse looking than the one before it, and a family living in one of them. They appear to be happy. Then we come to a mountainous region. For miles you cannot see a dwelling; then there will be a few huts with a little patch of ground cultivated. I would call it butchered, it looks as if it had been ploughed by hogs. Here the road is good but it is up and down grade and around sharp curves, until you would think the train was making the letter S. There are 27 tunnels between High Bridge, in Kentucky, and Chattanooga, some short, some long; they are from ten rods to three quarters of a mile in length. Sometimes we are running along in the bed of a ravine, and next minute on a mountain top. The hills are thickly covered with green trees, nearly one half evergreens. The timber is small and very close together, with a nice wild flower in places, like a rose. At 4 in the afternoon we come to Oaklale Hotel, in the valley, and stop for dinner. The rates are very reasonable, they only charge 75 cents a meal! In the valley we pass some blast furnaces. They get the ore and their coal out of the mountains, and before the railway was built they would ship it down the Tennessee river to Chattanooga. I was informed that a few northerners have located near here, and are raising garden stuff to ship north, and are getting rich, but it did not induce me to jump off the train. Before we arrive at Chattanooga we see a very good farming country, if it was only worked well. Cedartown is quite a pretty place. I have not seen very much of it yet. I have been out to the iron ore mines, about three miles from the city. They are not in operation just now, but have been doing quite a nice business. The ore is almost on top of the ground. They shovel off the dirt, which is sometimes 5 feet deep, and then get the ore. The whole country has a little iron ore in it, but not enough to mine it, only in some spots. I have seen some hay cut and the oats are turning already. The field corn is not very big but the garden corn is about 3 feet high. There will be plenty of peaches here this year. There will be a scarcity of peaches in the north, on account of severe frosts. The weather is very warm but not oppressive. There is a breeze of air most all the time. I think the population is about one half colored. They appear, although poor, to be very contented with their lot.

PESTILENCE THREATENED.

Several Persons Taken Alive From the Ruins.

DEATH ESTIMATE NOT LESSENED.

But One-fifth of the Debris Yet Looked Over.

WARNINGS THAT WERE NOT HEEDED.

The Very Latest This Afternoon.

It was found yesterday that four and even six families were being crowded into a single house, that as high as fifty slept in one room, that the doors and windows were left closed to shut out the stench and dampness, and that as a result pneumonia was gaining an alarming foothold. Dr. P. M. Carrington, of the U. S. Marine Hospital, estimates there are a hundred cases of the disease in Johnstown. He ascribes it to crowded rooms, damp cellars and exposure. The cold drizzle that fell intermittingly yesterday added to the gravity of the situation. Mr. Sibbet, of the State Board of Health, inspected the river towns above Johnstown as far as Connellsvile. He finds there is no immediate danger of the disease from dead bodies except at Rockwood, where an immense collection of wreckage is full of corpses.

The coroner's jury yesterday proceeded to the South Fork and investigated the cause of breakage of the reservoir dam. Witnesses testified that slight breaks had appeared in the dam several times in past years, but had each time been clumsily repaired with straw, sticks and rubbish. The general impression is that the jury will declare that the Pittsburg Fishing Club, that owned the reservoir, was guilty of gross negligence. In that event many suits for damages against the millionaire club will follow. An insurance agent estimates that the accident insurance policies alone for this place amount to $2,000,000.

The Altoona gang, by the use of dynamite, have located the day express which was swept away at Conemaugh. The ruins of the train lie about one hundred feet from the fourth buttress from the western end of the stone bridge. Parts of the parlor cars have to-day been found, as well as traces of the passengers. About 9 o'clock the baggage of Miss Annie Chism, of Nashville, Tenn., was found. She was a missionary on her way to Brazil for the Women's Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Church. It is evident many lives were lost on this train—more than at first supposed. The whole train affair is still a mystery.

There was a small riot at the labor camp this morning on account of there not being food enough for the men or utensils to cook it with. Mr. Flynn, who is at the head of the labor bureau, made a speech to the men and stated that it was almost impossible to get things down from the railroad.

Scenes and Incidents.

"This is my last message." This is the telegram which Mrs. H. M. Ogle, manager of the Johnstown telegraph office, sent just before she was swallowed up in the flood. Long after the danger was imminent, and longer after death was almost certain, Mrs. Ogle sat in the Johnstown telegraph office, over which she had presided for nearly a quarter of a century, and sent warning telegrams down the fated valley to the towns and villages below. The warnings were little noticed, but Mrs. Ogle did her duty to the last. Before her despatch was fairly received in Pittsburg it is thought the telegraph office went on the crest of the flood. Mrs. Ogle's daughter perished with her.

The flood swept away eight million gallons of whiskey.

During the work of removing the rubbish from the Johnstown Methodist Episcopal Church a man and his wife were found clasped so tightly in each other's arms that it was found necessary to bury them together. Just as the flood struck the city a wedding was going on, and the principals were drowned just as the ceremony was completed. The ministers and nearly all the witnesses escaped.

When it is remembered that previous to the heavy rain of last week Johnstown's reservoir contained nearly seventy-six thousand million gallons of water some idea of the force of the terrible avalanche of water may be formed, when it is known that the great reservoir was drained in an hour after the large dam gave way.

Long relief trains are rolling into Johnstown almost every hour. From east and west, north and south, come whole train loads of clothing and provisions, accompanied by special messages, having funds and large corps of volunteer physicians. Several hundred destitute people are being well cared for at Camp Hastings, on the Ebensburg road.

The special train of the Masonic Relief Association was sent from Pittsburg. The brother in charge spent the morning distributing the food and clothing brought up among the Masonic sufferers.

Poor old John Jordan, of Conemaugh! Many a tear ran over swarthy cheeks for him to-day. All his family, his wife and children, had been swept from his sight in the flood. He wandered over the gorge yesterday looking for them, and last night the police could not bring him away. At daylight he found his wife's sewing machine and called the workmen to help him. First they saw a little boy's jacket that he recognized and then they came upon the rest of them all buried together, the mother's burned arms still clinging to the little children. Then the white headed old man sat down in the ashes and caressed the dead bodies and talked to them just as if they were alive, until some one came and led him quietly away. Without a protest he went to the shore and sat down on a rock and talked to himself, and then got up and disappeared in the hills.

The one thing that most impresses the thoughtful now is the supreme danger that menaces Pittsburg and all the region dependent on the Alleghany River below the Kiskiminitas for its water supply. Only those who have seen the valley of the Conemaugh since the flood can appreciate this danger of disease from the polluted water.

Where Johnstown's principal stores stood last Friday are now pitched 1,000 tents, and before to-night this number will probably be doubled. Under this shelter are accommodated the members of the militia and thousands of workmen who are trying to clear the streets. Over 5,000 men are now thus employed in Johnstown proper. Contractor Flynn, who has charge of the army of laborers, said: "It will take 10,000 men thirty days to clear the ground so that the streets are passable and the work of rebuilding can be commenced.

How strikingly frequent is the reference in the death list to "Mrs. Jones and six children" and "Mrs. Smith and five children." In the morgue the little ones lie in dozens where the adults are in half-dozens, but there is and has been a much greater difficulty in recovering the bodies of the children. Being lighter and smaller, they have often been swept into out-of-the-way recesses that are almost inaccessible. The drift of opinion among physicians, engineers and railroad men is that from 1,000 to 1,500 of the bodies will never be found.

A grey-haired woman who applied for clothing at Johnstown asked that she might be given a black dress in exchange for the one first given her. "I have lost all my family," she added by way of apology, as the tears streamed down her wrinkled face, "and I would like to have a black dress if I could get one. My husband and four children are in that awful pile by the stone bridge, and I am alone now." A black dress was found for her.

Just below the bare plain where the business block of Johnstown stood, and above the stone arch bridge on which the Pennsylvania Railroad crossed the river, are seven acres of the wreckage of the flood. The horrors that have been enacted in that spot, the horrors that are seen there every hour, who can attempt to describe? Under and amid that mass of conglomerate rubbish are the remains of at least 1,000 persons who died the most frightful of deaths. This is the place where the fire broke out within twenty minutes after the flood. It has burned ever since. The stone arch bridge acted as a dam to the flood, and five towns were crushing each other against it. A thousand houses came down on the great wave of water, and were held there a solid mass in the jaws of a Cyclopean vise. A kitchen stove upset. The mass took fire. A thousand people were imprisoned in these houses. A thousand more were on the roofs. For most of them there was no escape. The fire swept on from house to house. The prisoners saw it coming and shrieked and screamed with terror, and ran up and down their narrow quarters in an agony of fear.

Thousands of people stood upon the river bank and saw and heard it all and still were powerless to help. They saw people kneeling in the flames and praying. They saw families gathered togetner with their arms around each other and waiting for death. They saw people going mad and tearing their hair and laughing. They saw men plunge into the narrow crevices between the houses and seek death in the water rather than wait its coming in the flames. Some saw their friends and some their wives and children perishing before them, and some in the awful agony of the hour went mad themselves and ran shrieking to the hillsides and stronger men lay down on the ground and wept. All that night and all the next day and far into the morning of Monday these dreadful shrieks resounded from that place of doom. The fire burned on, aided by the water underneath, added to by fresh fuel coming down the river. All that time the people stood helpless on the bank and heard those heartrending sounds. What could they do? They could not fight the fire. Every fire engine in the town lay in that mass of rubbish smashed to bits. For hours they had to wait until they could telegraph word to surrounding towns and hours more until the fire engines arrived at noon on Monday.

At Ninevah yesterday 746 bodies were buried.

Physicians claim there are several hundred cases of pneumonia.

The damage to the Cambria Iron Works, it is now said, will not exceed $300,000.

Eddie Fisher, a youth who lost his mother and five sisters, to-day, in a fit of despondency, threw himself from the roof of a building and was killed.

ESTIMATING THE NUMBER OF VICTIMS.

Up to last night about 2,500 bodies had been found, while 2,000, at the lowest calculation, are in the burned debris in the river; 3,000 are in unsearched sandbanks around the Cambria Works; from 1,000 to 2,000 are scattered in the valley from Woodville to the bridge, and 1,000 or 2,000 below the bridge, between Johnstown and Bolivar.

Hundreds were carried down to the broad rivers in the tremendous current and may never come into the hands of the living. Said Adjt.-Gen. Hastings: "In my opinion the loss is greater than we can now show figures for."

William Jones, of Braddock, thinks at least 10,000 to 12,000 were lost. The statement that 18,000 persons had registered at the registration bureau yesterday was incorrect. One of Gen. Hasting's aides said to-day that so many persons had registered twice or more that the list had to be revised, and that the total was not more than 13,000 and perhaps 12,500. This registration not only comprehends the population of Johnstown and adjoining towns, which was about 33,000, but embraces points further away in the flooded region, the total population of which was at least 45,000. Chairman Hicks, of the Altoona delegation, who has been all over the district, says the loss is 12,500 to 14,000.

A mother and daughter were rescued alive yesterday afternoon suffering from nervous shock and hunger. They were at once removed by rescuers and placed in charge of friends. Both will recover.

ENGINEER PARK'S STORY.

Resident Engineer Park, who was on the spot when the dam broke on Friday, says: "On Thursday night I noticed that the dam was in good order and the water was nearly seven feet from the top. When the water is at this height the lake is nearly three miles in length. It rained hard on Thursday night and I rode up to the end of the lake on the eventful day and saw that the woods around there were teeming with a seething cauldron of water. Col. Unger, the President of the Fishing Club that owns the property, put 25 Italians to work to fix the dam. A farmer in the vicinity also lent a willing hand. To strengthen the dam a plough was run along the top of it and earth was then thrown into the furrows. On the west side a channel was dug and a sluice was constructed. We cut through about four feet of shale rock, when we came to solid rock which was impossible to cut without blasting. Once we got the channel open the water leaped down to the bed rock, and a stream fully 20 feet wide and three feet deep rushed out on that end, while great quantities of water were coming in by the pier at the other end. And then in the face of this great escape of water from the dam it kept rising at the rate of 10 inches per hour. At noon I fully believed that it was practically impossible to save the dam, and I got on a horse and galloped down to South Fork and gave the alarm, telling the people at the same time of their danger and advising them to get to a place of safety. I also sent a couple of men to the telegraph tower, two miles away, and sent messages to Johnstown and Cambria, and to other points on the way. The young girl at the instrument fainted when the news reached her and was carried away. Then, by the timely warning given, the people at South Fork had an opportunity to move their household goods and betake themselves to a place of safety. Only one person was drowned in that place, and he was trying to save an old washtub that was floating down stream."

DR. GRAFF BELIEVES IN FIRE.

Dr. Graff was given charge of the Sanitary Commission this morning. Dr. Graff talked at length on the different plans of sanitation for the flooded district, and finally said: "There is but one sure, safe plan—burn everything. I think the order will be issued this evening to burn everything all over this district." Dr. Graff's plan of disposing of the debris above the bridge is to scatter oil over it and burn it.

Yesterday workmen found three members of Benjamin Hoffman's family, who occupied a large residence in the rear of Lincoln street. Benjamin Hoffman, the head of the family, was found seated on the edge of the bedstead. He was evidently preparing to retire when the flood struck the building. He had his socks in his pockets. His 20-year-old daughter was found close by attired in a night dress. The youngest member of the family, a 3-year-old infant, was also found beside the bed.

It seems almost incredible that so many bodies remain unidentified. Thousands of people from the different sections of the State have seen them, yet they remain unidentified. At Nineveh they are burying all the unidentified dead but in the morgues in this vicinity no bodies have been buried unless identified.

UNHEEDED WARNINGS.

Among the reports from Johnstown is one to the effect that Herbert Webber, employed as a sort of guard by the South Fork Club, had more than once reported to the club that the dam needed looking after. Here is the story: He had repeatedly, he declared, called the attention of the members of the club to the various leakages at the dam, but he received the stereotyped reply that the masonry was all right; that it had been "built to stand for centuries," and that such a thing as its giving way was among the impossibilities. But Webber did not hesitate to continue his warnings. Finally, according to his own statement, he was instructed to "shut up or he would be bounced." He was given to understand that the officers of the club were tired of his croakings, and that the less he said about the dam from thence on the better it would be for him. Webber then laid his complaint before the Mayor of Johnstown, not more than a month ago. He told him that the spring freshets were due, and that if they should be very heavy the dam would certainly give way. Webber says that the Mayor promised to send an expert to examine the dam then, and if necessary to appeal to the State. Somehow the expert was not chosen, the appeal was not made at Harrisburg and the catastrophe ensued. Webber goes on to say that had the dam been repaired after the spring freshet of last year the disaster would not have occurred.

Rev. Dr. Agnew, of Philadelphia, was pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Johnstown for ten years. He declares that danger has been apprehended from the bursting of the reservoir for twenty-five years. About twenty years ago an alarm was given in the middle of the night and the inhabitants were all ready to fly to the mountains at a moment's notice. The danger passed, however, and the town escaped. But it was a common thing for the streets to become filled with water from the river, and this fact helped maintain a fatal feeling of security until the flood from above was actually heard roaring down the great gorge.

The reported drowning of Blind Tom and his manager in the disaster is denied. Blind Tom is now in Canada.

It had been reported that the entire family of Prof. Seymour, the phrenologist, who spent a few weeks last winter in Hamilton, has been lost in the Johnstown disaster. Mr. Seymour left last week for the scene of the flood, and word has since been received from him confirming the report.

One of the most troublesome things to deal with at Johnstown is the great jam above the stone bridge. It is 1,200 feet long, about 400 wide, and from 12 to 20 feet deep. It is regarded as certain that in this immense mass of crushed buildings and debris the bodies of thousands of victims of the flood are buried. It is proposed to blast a channel through the jam by means of dynamite cartridges, and to divert into this channel the powerful current of the river. By means of this current the debris is to be taken away piecemeal. But the work will be slow and difficult.

Philadelphia's relief fund exceeds $550,000.

New York city's relief fund has already gone beyond $400,000.

WM. ROBERTS, M. D., Physician to the Manchester, Eng., Infirmary and Lunatic Hospital, Professor of Medicine in Owen's College, in speaking of kidney disease, says: "One-third die of uremic (uric acid) poisoning; a considerable number of dropsy; one-fifth from secondary pneumonia, pericarditis (inflammation of the heart sac), or pleurisy, exhaustion, indigestion, or the complications of apoplexy, hardening of the liver, bowel ulcers, etc." The foregoing are only a few of the common symptoms of advanced kidney disease, and this explains why Warner's Safe Cure cures so many different symptoms, called diseases, and why it has such popularity. Ask your friends and neighbors about it.

POISON, ROMANCE, MYSTERY.

The Extraordinary Family History of Mrs. Maybrick.

ACCUSED OF HUSBAND MURDER.

A London cablegram says: There is now in the county jail at Liverpool Mrs. Florence Maybrick, aged 26, the widow of a wealthy Liverpool cotton broker, who was nearly twice her age. The whole affair is a mixture of poison, romance and mystery. Her husband is said to have been an arsenic eater. Her friends say he died from natural causes; his friends say she killed him with arsenic. They met about seven years ago on a steamer from America. She fell down the saloon stairs and he caught her. The acquaintance thus begun ripened into love, and they were married in few weeks. He died two months ago. The doctors who attended would not give a certificate, an inquest was held and an open verdict was returned. The body was buried, but rumors induced the police to re-open the case. Another inquest was held, at which the evidence showed that Mrs. Maybrick purchased arsenic at chemists'; that the medicine, part of which she had given her husband, contained arsenic; that arsenical fly papers were found in her room soaking in water; that a letter to her lover, named Brierley, in very endearing terms, was intercepted, telling him all was safe, that he need not leave the country; that she attended her husband up to the time of his death, though for the last two days he was in charge of hired nurses; and that she had told the doctor she disliked her husband, with whom she often quarrelled. She was finally committed for trial at the assizes for wilful murder on Thursday. If she did poison her husband her homicidal tendency may be hereditary. Her mother was Miss Holbrook, of New York city, who went to Mobile, Alabama, before the war on a visit to her uncle, Rev. J. H. Ingraham, the author of the book entitled "The Prince of the House of David." She married there William G. Chandler, a wealthy merchant. They lived happily together until Frank Dubassy, a captain on the Confederate side, turned up. Chandler fell ill, no one attended him but herself, and it is said she killed him. She moved to Macon, Georgia, and married Dubassy. He was sent to Europe as a representative of the Confederate Government. Two days after sailing he died. At her request the body was thrown overboard. In two years she returned to New York, made a great scandal with an actor, returned to Europe, and married Baron Von Roque. They led an adventurous life together. She separated from him, and lived as the wife of an attache of the British Legation in Teheran, Persia. Mrs. Maybrick was a daughter of Chandler, and has a fortune in her own right. Her mother had a mania for collecting poisons, and gathered specimens in all parts of the world, and she had an intimate knowledge of the nature and effect of each deadly agent. Maybrick was well known in New Orleans, and was a brother of the popular song writer, "Stephen Adams."

WHAT CRONIN BELIEVED.

Evidence of Patrick McGarry at the Inquest.

A last (Wednesday) night's Chicago despatch says: In the Cronin inquest today Patrick McGarry, a friend of Dr. Cronin, testified as to what Cronin told him regarding the investigation by a committee of the Clan-na-Gael at Buffalo of charges that Alexander Sullivan appropriated funds of the Clan to his own use while a member of the Executive Board or "Triangle." McGarry said Cronin informed him that the charges were not only of misappropriation of funds, but that the Triangle had sent men to their death and to British prisons. The witness could not remember the exact amount of money mentioned by Cronin, but it approximated half a million. The witness then told of his visit to Toronto after Cronin's death, and the result of interviews with Reporter Long. The latter at first denied having sent the misleading despatches, but subsequently said he had sent a statement of the facts to Frank Scanlan, of this city. Cronin said to the witness, after the Buffalo investigation, that if he were murdered it would be at Alexander Sullivan's instigation. Cronin also said that the life of Dr. McCahey, of Philadelphia, who joined Cronin in reporting against Sullivan at the Buffalo investigation, was also in danger, and that an attempt had been made to decoy him away.

Willing to Test Electric Death.

An Albany despatch says: Gen. Austin Lathrop has received a letter from a Philadelphia man who said that he was poor and out of work, and that he had a large family to support. He had just seen a statement in some newspaper that Gen. Lathrop had some doubts whether the electrical apparatus which was to be placed in the three State prisons to execute murderers would destroy life instantaneously. If Gen. Lathrop would guarantee that the writer's family should be paid $5,000 in cash on his death he would submit himself to a trial with the electrical machine. In case Gen. Lathrop should look favorably upon this offer, he would request him to insert a personal addressed to "A. F." in the Philadelphia Ledger.

Every Man to His Trade.

Jinks (at a variety entertainment)—"That fellow in front of us was about the only one who didn't applaud that good old song, 'Don't Despise a Man Because He Wears a Ragged Coat.' He must be a regular aristocrat, isn't he?"

Blinks—"Well, I dunno. Maybe he's a tailor."

Emma Juch was plumply asked her age by a Pittsburg reporter, and responded: "Well"—with a laugh—"I will tell you truly, for I have nothing to hide. I don't look to be 21, do I?" "You most certainly do not. "Well"—with brilliant smile—"I am just 27."

—If you have nothing else to do, see how rapidly you can say, "Soup soothes theosophists thoroughly."

The fire at Seattle burned out 280 firms and persons, most of whom lose all.

THE CZAR'S AMBITION.

He Gives More Than a Gentle Hint to the Shah—Big Dowry for a Princess.

A St. Petersburg despatch says: Prince George, the Czar's favorite son, and probably his successor, in view of the weak brain and general debility of the Czarewitch, will soon begin a tour of the world, starting from Paris, where his presence is intended to mark the Czar's adhesion to the French alliance. It is declared that the Czar is definitely committed to a panslavist policy, involving critical developments which are bound to have a violent end. It is said that the Czar told the Shah, and hotly too, that if while in England he should make any concession unfavorable to Russia, 100,000 soldiers on the frontier would be made to march into Persia.

It is reported that during the Shah's visit a secret treaty was made between Russia and Persia for the temporary annexation of Northern Persia to Russia in certain cases.

The Czar has bestowed a dowry of a million roubles on Princess Militza of Montenegro, who has been betrothed to Grand Duke Peter of Russia.

Signor Crispi appears to have obtained a definite pledge of German aid in the event of hostilities with France from a colonial or any other dispute. Austria is only committed to the first treaty, and is not bound to make common cause with Italy in every quarrel with France.

A London cablegram says: The Czar's extreme favoritism to the Prince of Montenegro has aroused the anger of all his southern neighbors, and in none of the Balkan States does the ill feeling run so high as in Servia. The Servian Russophiles are especially angry and ex-Queen Natalie is thrown into a state of ungovernable rage, alternating with that of fear for the stability of her son's throne. Prince Karageorgevitch, the pretender to the throne of Servia, is a son-in law of Prince Nikita, of Montenegro, whose ambition has been for years to found a Slavonic Empire in the Balkans. With the husband of his daughter as the ruler of one of the Balkan States, himself on the throne of another, and the Czar at his back, the goal of his ambition would seem to be not very difficult of attainment.

IS THIS ALL GOSPEL?

A Modern Prophet's Eloquence Saves Him From Severe Punishment.

A last (Friday) night's Waukesha, Wis., despatch says: The eloquence of Simon B. Needham, whose predictions of the second coming of Christ and the birth of a child on the date specified was incidentally connected with his arrest on a charge of illegitimate parentage preferred by Mrs. Clark, to-day saved the prophet from a long term in the penitentiary. Mr. Needham addressed the court at some length, giving a summary of the history of his life. So eloquently did he tell his story that when he withdrew his special plea of guilty and admitted his guilt Judge Sloan inflicted the nominal punishment of three days in the county jail. The case was called late in the afternoon, and considerable time was spent in finding twelve men who had not formed an opinion as to whether or not the prophet is insane. When a jury was finally secured Mr. Needham took the stand and asked the Judge the privilege of relating the history of his mother and himself, which was granted. Mr. Needham started his narrative with a statement that surprised people who had known him for years, stating that his mother was a slave, and that he was born in slavery. He told of their escape from bondage and their flight to Canada; told of his early struggles for an education, of his religious opinions, and of his arrest and imprisonment in Canada for seven years for preaching his opinions to the world. He said he was ready and willing to make Mrs. Clark his wife, which, owing to the divorce recently secured by Mrs. Needham, could be done lawfully.

FIVE RAFTSMEN DROWNED.

An Overloaded Boat Capsizes in the Ottawa River.

A Grenville (Que.) despatch says: A sad drowning accident took place here at noon to-day, by which five men lost their lives. A gang of raftsmen, nineteen in number, under the charge of Elisha Cooke, pilot, started to cross the river at the head of the Long Sault to join their raft, which was lying on the south shore of the river. The boat was overloaded considering the weather. The wind at the time blew a perfect hurricane and they had not proceeded very far before the boat became full of water and sank, leaving the human cargo floundering in the water. A number clung to the boat and were saved through the exertions of Wm. Cooke and Peter Leroy, who succeeded in reaching them by means of another boat. The remainder of the crew struck for the shore, but five of them sank and were lost. Their names are Eli Robillard, sen., Joseph Cooke, Louis Lemay, Geo. Sarasin, of Grenville, and a Mr. Windsor, of Cumberland.

COLD WATER OR WHISKEY.

Ontario Doctors Discuss a Most Important Topic.

USES AND ABUSES OF ANTIPYRETICS.

At the annual meeting of the Ontario Medical Association last (Thursday) night Dr. Thorburn was called upon to read his paper on "The Uses and Abuses of Antipyretics." He dealt mainly with the treatment of patients in fever, and seemed to favor the cold water bath cure for reducing temperature.

Dr. Workman opened a discussion by asking gentlemen to give their views on the antipyretic power of whiskey. He had used it liberally on many occasions, and had no reason to be dissatisfied with the results. He asked for the views of the meeting with all due consideration for the Scott Act. (Laughter.)

Dr. Oldright remarked that there were many people now in their graves with whiskey who would not have been there if they had stuck to cold water.

There was a risible scene at this point, as several wanted the floor. Dean Geikie caught the speaker's eye. He confessed to having used it sometimes and thought it acted admirably, if judiciously given, but much depended on the state and condition of the patient.

Dr. Cameron instanced the case of forty patients he had treated without the use of antipyretics, and said they presented as good a record as forty others which he knew had been treated antipyretically.

Dr. Carson thought the question of using whiskey as an antipyretic was pretty well settled by the British Medical Association several years ago when Dr. B. W. Richardson, of London, clearly demonstrated that a glass of whiskey, instead of increasing a man's temperature, decidedly lowered it, not at the time, but a little bit after. The increase was due to the stimulating effect on the heart.

Dr. Holmes, of Chatham, described several experiments he had tried with cold-blooded animals. He found that by applying heat to the heart of a turtle it increased the circulation. Acting on this theory, he had tried the cold water cure some years ago on a fevered child in convulsions and temperature at 105 degrees. On being bathed in ice water the temperature was reduced to 100 and the convulsions stopped. He had found it operated most successfully, since friends were often scrupulous about this method of treatment. In some cases sponging with whiskey and water was successful.

Dr. Workman said that while medical superintendent of the asylum a man named Caleb came to him suffering from violent religious mania. He prescribed a warm bath for at least twenty minutes, and deputed two men to do it. Hot and cold taps were in the bath, and by mistake they bathed the patient entirely in hot. He (Dr. Workman) afterwards prescribed a glass of whiskey. (Laughter.) In the morning the man was perfectly rational and remained so. (Applause.) He could quote other instances having the most salutary effect.

Dr. Richardson gave the case of a woman suffering from erysipelas in the head. He prescribed half a pint of whiskey, to be taken during the night. In the morning the patient was entirely convalescent. (Applause.)

Hon. Dr. Sullivan admitted that the subject was one of the most difficult and abstruse problems in medical science. Some pooh-poohed the efforts of scientists in endeavoring to find the heat centres, but he did not see why the heat centre should not be located as well as the respiratory or any other centre. The duty of a physician in each case was to estimate the necessity as symptoms presented themselves. At certain times whiskey might be used, and at another time cold water. Cold water was undoubtedly the best antipyretic. Their efforts to find an agent to reduce and elevate temperature was in accordance with rational medicine.

The New Marriage Service.

Good Minister (a married man)—Do you wish to marry this woman?

Man—I do.

Minister—Do you wish to marry this man?

Woman—I do.

Minister—Do you like the city as a place of residence?

Man—No; I prefer the suburbs.

Minister—Do you like the suburbs?

Woman—No, indeed; I prefer the city.

Minister—Are you a vegetarian in diet?

Man—No; I hate vegetables. I live on beef.

Woman—I can't bear meat. I am a vegetarian.

Minister—Do you like a sleeping-room well ventilated?

Man—Yes; I want the window way down, summer and winter.

Minister—Do you like so much fresh air?

Woman—No; it would kill me. I want all windows closed.

Minister—Do you like a light in the room?

Man—No; can't sleep in the light; want the room dark.

Minister—Are you afraid in the dark?

Woman—Indeed I am; I have always had a bright light in my room.

Minister—Do you like many bedclothes?

Man—All I can pile on.

Minister—Do you?

Woman—No; they suffocate me.

Minister—I hereby pronounce you man and wife, and may the Lord have mercy on your souls.—New York Weekly.

AUSTIN FLINT, M. D., late professor of the principles of practice of medicine and of clinical medicine in the Bellevue Hospital Medical College, says of Bright's Disease: "Pain in the loins is rarely a prominent symptom, and is often wanting. This statement also applies to tenderness on pressure over kidneys." It is not safe, therefore, to argue that you have not kidney disease because you have no local symptoms of it. Your only sure plan is to use Warner's Safe Cure as soon as the most remote symptoms appear.

—"I am tired of living with such a homely woman!" exclaimed William Rush, of Niagara Falls, as he walked away from his wife six weeks ago. The other day she was left a legacy of $40,000, and William hurried back home to call her his angel wife, but she wouldn't let him in.

Open for an engagement—Portholes.

THE following story is told of Sir James Hannen: He was hearing a divorce case in which one of the witnesses, a rather bumptious personage, inquired with an air of one who is putting a poser, "Pray, my lord, am I to give my evidence for nothing?" "I think," replied Sir James, "that you will have to give it for what it is worth."

A MAN in Watertown, N. Y., thought it would be to his advantage to frighten his wife, so he tied a rope around his neck and suspended himself from a convenient hook. Then he awaited developments. His wife took the matter calmly and made no attempt to cut him down. Before very long the practical joker was surprised to find himself dead. His wife is said to look very attractive in heavy mourning. It was shabby of her to spoil her husband's joke, but she may not have had a fine sense of humor.

THIBET is the only known country on earth not open to Christian missions. It has an area of 750,000 square miles, about as large as the United States east of the Mississippi River. The greatest length from east to west is 1,500 miles, and the population is estimated at 8,000,000. It is the stronghold of Buddhism. Lhassa, the capital, is the "Rome" of the Buddhists, and the Dalai Lama is the Buddhist Pope. He is supreme in both temporal and spiritual things. One monastery has about 5,000 Budhist priests, and there are about 60,000 in the country. Thibet is virgin soil for missions. The country is tributary to China.

WHEN rogues fall out, such as the respective bacteria of consumption and rheumatism, honest men may get their due, by the destruction of the one kind and the exhaustion of the other by the job. Dr. Lanigan, of Hyde Park, Mass., says that he has for many years held a belief in the antagonism between certain complaints. He believes that he has discovered such antagonism in the case of consumption and rheumatism. The effect of turning consumptives into rheumatics was tried by transfusion of blood taken from a patient suffering from acute rheumatism. The recipients of the blood were attacked with rheumatism within a week. All three patients improved, and seem to be on the high road to recovery from consumption.

ERASTUS WIMAN, it seems, has been maintaining a scheme of home insurance on Staten Island. He has built a lot of houses, costing not over $1,500 apiece, and rented them to New York workingmen for $300 a year for a series of years, on the condition that if the occupant died before his lease expired the house was to become the property of his widow in fee simple; if he did not die, it would belong to the occupant at the expiration of the lease. Being in Pittsburg the other day, Mr. Wiman was visited by two local millionaires who had in mind a similar enterprise. He told them not to embark in the scheme if they had any idea of making money out of it, for he had lost on it right along, but regarded it as a piece of philanthropy. It is said that many of the houses that he built fell to widows before they had been one-third paid for.

The Story of a Will.

(From the Toronto Mail.

To the Editor of the Mail: [illegible]

Having seen a letter in your paper from Mr. John Cooper, of this town, reminded me of an incident which occurred about three years ago. A friend of mine, Mr. A. Seymour, was staying at Vermillion Bay, on the C.P.R., west of here. A legacy was left to him by an uncle in London, England. Mr. Seymour was in such bad health at the time that he thought he would not be alive when the legacy would reach here. He therefore wrote to me asking me to have his will prepared and sent to him for signature, etc., appointing me as the legatee in trust. The will was prepared by John M. Munn, Esq., barrister, of this town, and was sent to Mr. Seymour. It was returned to me duly executed, and is still in my possession.

In the same letter was a request to send half a dozen bottles of Warner's Safe Cure, and some pills. I sent them. I received a letter some time after asking me to send some more, as he was feeling much better. I did so, and the next I knew Mr. Seymour himself came to town and told me (and looked it) that he was a well man. He got his money through the Ontario Bank here, and is now in British Columbia, and was in good health when I last heard from him.

I may say that I know both Mr. and Mrs. Cooper well, and the facts in Mrs. Cooper's case are as stated in Mr. Cooper's letter.

You can publish this or not, as you think fit, as it is nothing to me either way.

Yours, etc., W. C. DOBIE, J. P.

Queen Victoria's Sensible Shoes.

A shoemaker from London, who worked in the shop where Queen Victoria's shoes are made, being interviewed by a reporter, said: "I suppose the Queen's number is at least a six and she wears a sensible shoe, long and broad, with a low heel, and plenty of room at the toes. She has several bunions and corns, you know. I suppose her common sense ideas about shoes didn't come to her until late in life. I remember making a pair of ball shoes for the Princess Beatrice just before I left. She has a foot something like her mother's. It was short and fat, the ankle being what you might call boxed just a little. Her number was a four and she wore out perhaps a dozen pairs a year."

BONNETS AND PINS.

The Fashionable Greens as Foes to the Complexion.

The coming bonnet is a subject of feminine interest, but the staying one appeals much more to mankind. If there is anything under heaven a man loathes worse than getting up early in the morning or going to bed early at night it is to be walking with a woman who is never quite certain as to whether her bonnet intends to remain on her head or to take wings unto itself and settle in an ash barrel. The chances are she objects to pins in the first place, and the other chances are that if she approves of bonnet pins she doesn't know how to place them. You cannot wear your hair low and pin your bonnet to it without that bonnet rising in rocking-horse fashion and giving you a distracted appearance, and you need not rely on strings to keep your bonnet on your head. If you wear your hair low you have got to have a small pad of false hair, which you lay right on top of your head, fasten down securely, and when your bonnet is put on stick your pins through it; then and then only are you safe, and then and then only is the man of your heart certain that your bonnet is the prettiest he has ever seen, because, as he emphatically puts it, "It stays on."

Among the very latest colors are a green that gives you a beautiful complexion, beautiful in the sense of being desirable as an advertisement before certain liver pills are taken, and a crimson shade that makes the average brunette look black and the average blonde corpse-like. And yet women wear both these colors and make positive that most clever and true French saying: "There are no ugly women; there are only women who do not know how to look pretty."

Continental Drunkards and Their Treatment.

An habitual drunkard in Sweden and Norway is treated as a criminal, in this sense, that his inordinate love of strong drink renders him liable to imprisonment; and whilst in confinement it appears he is cured of his bad propensities on a plan that, though simple enough, is said to produce marvellous effects. From the day the confirmed drunkard is incarcerated no other nourishment is served to him or her but bread and wine. The bread, however, it should be said, cannot be eaten apart from the wine, but is steeped in a bowl of it, and left to soak thus an hour or more before the meal is served to the delinquent. The first day the habitual toper takes his food in this shape without the slightest repugnance. The second day he finds it less agreeable to his palate, and very quickly he evinces a positive aversion for it. Generally, we read, eight or ten days of this regime is more than sufficient to make a man loathe the very sight of wine, and even refuse the prison dish set before him. This manner of curing drunken habits is said to succeed almost without an exception, and men or women who have undergone the treatment not only rarely return to their evil way, but from sheer disgust they frequently become total abstainers afterwards.—Evening Standard.

In recent years it has been claimed by chemists that the changes attending the dissolution of metals in acids are only in part electrical and in part chemical.

The quality of the effects produced by aluminum and copper diaphragms for telephones is very remarkable, as they give the timbre of sounds and of articulate speech far better than iron.

In a recent paper on the hygiene of Japanese houses the common idea that dwelling houses in that country are very unhealthy was distinctly disproved. The remarkably small infant mortality among the Japanese shows that their houses are healthy and suited to their modes of life.

Rules for a Rainy Day.

If the umbrella is at the "other end of the line," bear it patiently. Some other umbrella will do just as well.

Be sure and inform every one you meet that "it rains." Otherwise they might remain in ignorance of the damp fact.

Waterproof garments may be depended upon to shed water upon other folks. That seems to be the chief object of their existence.

Do not allow any ventilation in a horse car on a rainy morning. It might exhilarate the passengers to deeds of violence.

Carry your umbrella very carefully and you can just manage to drain one quarter section of it down the neck of the person who is so unfortunate as to be a head of you. He will appreciate this.

No Chance in a Fight.

A Critical Opinion.

"I saw you at the opera last night, Mr. Smythe. Did you enjoy it?" "Yes, very much." "Which part did you like best?" "Oh, I don't know exactly. It struck me as being the prettiest when they all wore pink!"

The Congregationalist reports that one of the quaint old Scottish preachers in Edinburgh recently used this phrase in his prayer: "O Lord, bless those who are at home, unable to be present; those who might be here if they would; bless the poor, and bless the rich, who after their funerals, will be poor!"

The Philadelphia Record, commenting upon the new Minnesota law for the punishment of drunkenness, asks: "Who is to judge whether a Minnesotan be drunk or sober?" Whereupon the Minneapolis Tribune replies: "The Minnesotan's wife, good friend; the Minnesotan's wife."

NOTHING LIKE PRAISE.

Many a Child is Heart Hungry for a Little Encouragement.

Parents are too often slow to see the motive of their children's kindest actions. A little fellow has been reading of some young hero who helped his father and mother in all sorts of ways; and after racking his brains to think how he, too, can help, he remembers that he can fetch his father's slippers and take his boots away and put them in the proper place. Without saying a word to anybody when evening comes he does it, but the father is so occupied that he notices not what the boy has done. The little fellow hopes on, thinking that when he goes to bed his father will say how pleased he was to see Charley so willing to help; but not a word is uttered, and the boy goes to bed with a choking feeling in his throat and says his prayers by the bedside with a sadness very real in his heart. Parents often complain of children not being so ready to help as they should be. The fault is with the parents, who have not known how to evoke feelings with which the heart of every child is richly stored. All words of approval are helpful and encouraging. In a large family there have been days of anxiety and care. The eldest daughter by her skill in teaching has earned a little extra money, and without a word to any one she lays nearly all of it out in buying things that are much needed in the house. What joy fills her heart when a fond mother takes her aside, and with emotion that cannot be concealed says how thankful she is for such considerate kindness, and murmurs: "I don't know what we should do without you, darling!" My friends, do not be so chary of these words of encouragement.—Good Words.

Ontario's Success in Making Cheese.

Englishmen sometimes ask, How comes it that a young country like Canada has forced her way ahead of almost all competitors in the cheese markets of Great Britain? No rents, little taxes, and great natural resources will, no doubt, suggest an answer in part; but if some further influence is to be sought, as we believe it must be, it may be found in the judicious stimulous which the industry receives from the governing authorities in the various Provinces. Take Ontario as an instance. Where in England will one find an organization which provides the farmers free of charge with such a bulletin as that entitled "Notes for Cheese-makers for May," which Mr. James W. Robertson, the Professor of Dairying at the Guelph Provincial College, has prepared, and which has by this time reached all Ontario farmers through the Provincial Department of Agriculture? In the first place we find nine practical suggestions as to the management of factories and their surroundings; next come thirty suggestions on "Milk and Making;" and lastly four suggestions for the patrons of each cheese factory. In this little eight-paged pamphlet the Ontario farmer has a vade mecum to the highest forms of cheese-making. What wonder that with such a royal road to success pointed out to him he should outdistance his competitors even in European markets.—Canadian Gazette, London.

The Men Who Stand to Win.

People go to a public gaming table with their eyes open. They know at Monte Carlo that the zero is against them at roulette, and they are content to face the certainty of the refait at the rouge et noir. Consequently they are assured that the bank must win in the long run, and they back their highly speculative chances in full connaisance de cause. But the sharp-witted innocents who stand "to win" upon unknown horses, while professing to calculate chances, never care to count with certainties. Yet surely it might be worth their while to consider that the great world of betting men and tipsters must live. A few of the book-makers make fortunes out of the victims who are fleeced; many more might retire upon competencies were they only decently prudent; and, in any case, the indispensable expenses of the professional are enormous. The net profits at the best are but a small percentage on the heavy gross outlay.—Saturday Review.

Consumption in Canada.

At the meeting of the Ontario Medical Association yesterday, Dr. W. T. Aikins, Toronto, read a paper on "The General Management of the Patient and Sick Room in Canada." He maintained that Canadians were not so robust generally as Old Country people on account of the bad ventilation of the houses, particularly during the winter, when stoves consumed the pure air and windows were seldom or ever opened. He described a process of filtering the air and exhibited a piece of gauze or cotton batting to be used in lieu of the window of the room of a sick or consumptive patient, showing how it prevented the entrance of impurities, including smoke and dust.

A Plague of Grasshoppers.

Farmers coming to and from the surrounding country report the presence of myriads of grasshoppers. The recent rains killed off a good many of them, but it needed a good deal colder downfall than any we have had yet to do much good. What with the grasshoppers and caterpillars, the outlook for the country districts is not so encouraging as it was a fortnight back when everything looked fair for phenomenal crops.—Ottawa Herald.

Hot Water for Inflamed Eyes.

Hot water is now a remedy so popular and varied in its applications that it is not surprising to hear it recommended for the treatment of inflamed and itching eyes. An American writer, a woman whose eyesight was wonderful, considering her age and the immense amount of labor she performed, attributed it mainly to the custom of bathing her eyes freely in water as hot as could be borne, night and morning, a habit continued for many years.—Buffalo Times.

DEAD AMONG HIS PETS.

They Died With Him When August Hintze Passed Away.

A crowd of children were yesterday afternoon peering into the basement of a big tenement house at No. 414 East Seventy-ninth street, where August Hintze, an old man whose face had been for years a familiar one in the neighborhood, had been found dead in bed. He was a widower, 77 years old, and lived alone in two dark little rooms with two canary birds, a family of white mice and a woolly-haired terrier. Save for an occasional visit from his two grown-up sons, one of whom is in Nevada and the other in this city, no one ever came to see him. Last Saturday night the old man went home, followed by his dog, and lay down on his bed. Sunday he did not appear and most of that day his dog kept howling. Yesterday morning the janitor of the tenement became alarmed and broke open the door. The windows were all closed and the gas turned on. Hintze was undressed, in bed, dead, and stretched by his side, also dead, was his inseparable companion, the dog. The white mice on the window sill and the canary birds near by were also dead in their cages.

The police were notified, and Hintze's son, who lives at No. 415 East Eighty-fifth street, subsequently had the body removed to his home. It is thought that the old man was asphyxiated accidentally. The gas cock worked very loosely, and he probably turned it on after turning it off, not knowing what he was doing. He suffered from an incurable malady, which at times deprived him of his senses.—New York World.

Pills and Poetry.

There are men who make a living by writing rhymes in which they extol the virtues of somebody's tooth-wash, or consumption cure, or Purgative Pellets. It rather grates upon one's feelings to read a pathetic stanza of poetry and finish by learning that Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery is the sovereign remedy for consumption in its early stages, for deranged liver, disordered kidneys, impure or impoverished blood. Still this is absolutely true, and why should not the truth be told in poetry as well as prose.

Life's Real Episodes.

Jones—There are only two periods in a man's life when he is greatly interested in his personal appearance."

Smith—When do they occur?"

Jones—One is at 20, when he watches the hair coming out of his upper lip, and the other is at 40, when he watches the hair coming out on the top of his head.

Sedentary Habits.

In this age of push and worry, the business man and the professional man are alike unable to devote any adequate time to exercise. In the daily round of toil and pleasure, no suitable provision is made for that important function, and the result is that men of sedentary habits become subject to many forms of ailments arising from a torpid or sluggish liver. Constipation, sick headache, biliousness and dyspepsia are all due to improper action of the liver. Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets cure these troubles by restoring the liver to its normal condition.

Mr. T. Bates returned to the Sault on Saturday. Mr. Bates has great faith in the Sault becoming an important commercial centre and has staked a considerable amount upon the issue. Just now he is interested in the building of a new water power canal which will be when completed 3 miles long, 300 feet wide and 20 deep. Upon the pay roll now are 600 men and the number is expected to reach 1000 by July 1. The canal will be completed this year, and is built by a syndicate with a view to renting water powers along its course. It is a great undertaking but will no doubt pay handsomely.

Miss Lizzie Brown, of Collingwood, is visiting at Mr. Fred Armstrong's.

J.W. Armstrong, Esq., paid the Toronto conference a visit during the past week.

Mr. J. T. Wright, of St. Louis, is the guest of his father, Thorpe Wright, Esq. Mr. D. Wright, of New York, wife and child, are visiting their parents here.

Garden Party.

The garden party to be given by the ladies of the Methodist Church on Dominion Day, on the beautiful grounds of J.W. Armstrong, Esq., promises to be one of the best ever held here. The program will be a good one. Flesherton brass band is engaged for the ocasion. The waiters will be in costume. All sorts of games will be provided, and a general good time may be expected The gardens will be open from 4 p.m. Tea served at 6 o'clock. Admission 15 cents.

The Crops.

We have lately been around the country to a considerable extent, and find that the crops, as a general rule, are looking well—only in occasional low situations do they present a sickly appearance. This is almost a matter of surprise when the amount of rain which has fallen during the past four weeks is taken into consideration. Fruit in the vicinity of Kimberley was not very much injured by the late frost. We saw plum trees fairly "groaning" under their weight of nicely developed fruits. Apples in the same vicinity promise a fair yield. Small fruits suffered to a considerable extent.

Got Left.

A young man living near Priceville took his best girl for a drive one day last week. They visited a friend living west of Durham and turned the horse out to grass while they visited. The horse becoming homesick let down the fence for himself and trotted off home. It was some time before the horse's departure became known, but when it did there were "two hearts that beat as one" with agony at the thought of walking twelve miles home again. However the friend hitched up his team and returned the wanderers to their sorrowing parents, and the adventure ended happily. It was a fair-sized joke, and Balsam Valleyites are still holding their sides over it.

Editorial Irony.

A brother editor of considerable experience thus sums up his dislikes: We like to hear a man refuse to take his home paper, and all the time sponge on his neighbors for the reading of it. We like to hear a man complain when asked to subscribe for a home paper that he takes more now than he can read, and then go and borrow his neighbor's or loaf around until he gathers all the news from it. We like to hear a man run down his home paper as not worth taking and now and then beg the editor for a favor in the editorial column. We like to see a man run down his home paper and then try to get a share of the trade which the newspaper brings to town. We like to see this; it looks economical, thrifty, progressive, and cheeky."

The Washington Treaty

is one of the important topics of the day, but more important still to a sufferer from catarrh is the question what remedy shall I use? Try Nasal Balm. It never fails. Mr. John Kelly, Cobourg, says: Nasal Balm has helped me more than I expected it would. I have not felt so well in nine years. I am sure it will make a permanent cure.

That hacking cough can be so quickly cured by Shiloh's Cure. We guarantee it. For sale at the Medical Hall.

Failed.

The following appeared in last week's Monetary Times: It is understood that A. McCabe, general storekeeper, of Priceville, has assigned to a Toronto creditor. He is indebted to general creditors about $8,000, and to a brother and a lady $2,400. Those interested are trying to garinshee a bank account of $2,500, which it is feared might be used to liquidate the claims of the two last named, in which event the dividend to others would be very small.

Fire at Maxwell.

From our own Correspondent.

Fire broke out in the stables and out buildings belonging to the hotel about eleven o'clock on Tuesday night. The fire was discovered by Dr. Scott who had returned home about that time. There was only one horse in the stable at the time and it was saved with difficulty. A sulky and a buggy were the other things saved. The hotel was saved, Sam Linley burning his feet in dashing water over the roof. The property belongs to Robert Brown of Singhampton. No insurance.

County Court.

From The Owen Sound Advertiser.

FISHER vs. CHRISTIE.—The parties live in Sullivan. By an agreement made on the 23rd of April 1888, the Defendant sold plaintiff the N½ of lot 29, con. 7 Sullivan, reserving to himself all the pine timber and all other timber suitable for saw logs. Plaintiff alleged that the defendant had taken a great deal of timber not suitable for saw logs, and had made the same into posts and ties. The plaintiff's witnesses placed the minimum diameter of a saw-log at 10 or 12 inches. The defendant produced witnesses who said that timber 7 and even 5 inches in diameter might be fairly classed as saw-log timber. There was also a dispute as to whether when defendant had cut down a tree and took 9 or more saw-logs off it, whether he was entitled to the whole tree if the top part fell below the minimum size of a saw-log. Verdict for plaintiff for $105. A. Frost for Plaintiff; J. Creasor for deft.

BRODIE vs. MCARDLE.—The parties live in Proton. It appears that last December Joseph McArdle was convicted before Justice Hanbury, of Dundalk, for malicious injury to property. McArdle admitted having cut certain rollers which were placed under a hall for the purpose of moving the hall, and claimed that as trustee of this property he was justified in so doing, claiming that the hall should not be moved. Consequently he appealed against the decision of the Magistrate. Appeal sustained and Magistrate's conviction quashed. A. Frost for appellant.

REG. vs. BROWN was the only criminal case. Elizabeth Ottewell, of the Township of Osprey, charged Robert Brown, of the Village of Feversham, with indecent assault. Her evidence was unsupported by that of any other witness. Counsel for the defence, besides pointing out the prosecutor's evidence was unsupported in any way, thought from the style in which the evidence was given and the general behaviour of the witness that she was the victim of some hallucination. Some half a dozen witnesses were called to prove an alibi. Verdict—Not guilty. A. Frost for Crown; J.W. Frost for defence.

General News.

Dr. Meacham, M.P.P., has been chosen as the Conservative candidate for Lennox for the Ontairio Legislature.

Private William Ilion, of the 39th Norfolk Battalion, suicided by drowning in the Niagara River Sunday morning.

A brakeman named Lake was killed on the G.T.R. near Prescott on Saturday. He was tightening the brake when the chain slipped and he fell under the cars.

At Indianapolis, the other day, Mrs. Ella Kilbourn lighted a match in the cellar to enable a plumber to find a natural gas leak. The plumber was perhaps fatally injured, and Mrs. Kilbourn, J.T. Crowder and another man were seriously injured by the explosion that followed.

An unknown woman threw herself into the Niagara River and was carried over the American Falls Friday afternoon.

District News.

Richard Bickle, of East Zorra, has a four-year-old bull with a third horn attached to the tip of one of its ears, and John Nichol, of North Easthope, is the happy possessor of a duckling hatched without feet, while James Doherty, of the same township, rejoices in the ownership of a gosling with four feet.

Mr. Joe Johnson, of Dunedin, has a curio in the shape of a ducklet, with three legs and six feet. The little birdie was hatched on his farm. Two legs are quite natural and the third sticks out of the the bird's stern in the center of its body. The duckie should be a good swimmer.—[Collingwood Enterprise.

DEATH OF A DUNDALK DOCTOR.—Dr. W. S. Griffin died at his residence in Dundalk on Saturday afternoon last. The The doctor was laid up with cold several days previously, but went out before he had fully recovered and a relapse ensued. Dr. McWilliams, of Dundalk, was in attendance and Dr. Rolstin was summoned from here, but the case was hopeless and the deceased passed away five minutes after the arrival of his Shelburne colleague. Dr. Griffin has been a resident of Dundalk for the past 6 or 7 years. He was a graduate of the University of Michigan, and regarded as an experienced and clever man in his profession.—[Shelburne Free Press.

Character Development.

BY N. W. CAMPBELL, PUBLIC SCHOOL INSPECTOR FOR SOUTH GREY.

Exactly 188 years ago, on the 28th of August last, (1888) there was born at Frankfort-on-the-main, a child that was destined to exert an influence on his own nation, and indeed on the nations of the world, that will be felt for ages. The child doubtless passed through the vicissitudes of infancy and youth, and from youth passed to manhood much the same as others born in different circumstances. Being royally endowed by nature, he was fitted to make royal use of his power by a liberal education and a broad culture. He was born at the beginning of a period of unsurpassed activity in Europe and in the world—a period of political turbulency and grand military achievements, and he lived to see the storm calmed, the angry passions subsided, the noise of warring elements hushed by the glorious victory of Waterloo. The movements in his environments seemed to be reflected on his own soul within. He too passed through mental war, gloom, and despondency. Once he was on the verge of suicide. He calmly contemplated the various methods of ending one's life. The Sword of Ajax, drowning, hanging, poison, opening of veins, the asp of Cleopatra, the dagger of the Emperor Otho was each in turn thought of. But he rose from his despondency. His better nature prevailed. Once more he was master of himself. He saw there was much in this world worth living for—much that was beautiful and good. His manhood asserted itself. He rose triumphant over his moral difficulties and, he poured forth his sorrows in a strain that made heaving, tumultuous Europe listen. He became, in very deed, the Redeemer of the time. "Did he not hear the curse of the time? He was filled full, as Carlyle says, with its scepticism, bitterness, hollowness and thousandfold contradictions, till his heart was like to break; but he subdued all this, rose victorious over this, and manifoldly, by word and act, showed others that came after how to do the like. Honor to him who first through the impassable paves a road!

The impassable gulf into which this man ventured, which he tamed and rendered habitable, was the greatest and most perilous of all, wherein truly all others be included: The whole distracted existence of man in an age of unbelief." Such was Goethe, "the greatest of all great men in German literature." Something within him compels our attention. Some latent mysterious power commands our respect. When he speaks we must listen. His personality is all-conquering. He is a prince even in death. The question is pertinent now, what is the secret of such power, such moral force? Can we doubt that there was something within the man much finer than anything ever seen of him, than anything that ever came out? What is it that lifts him so prominently into view? I answer that the secret of his power, his influence, his moral force—this undefinable, elevating, all-pervading individuality is nothing else than Character

In England, nearly two centuries ago, Wm. Pitt, the Earl of Chatham, first saw the light. Of his early life we know little, but when comparatively young, he entered politics, and before long he became the leading orator and statesman of his time—perhaps of all time in English history. We are not now concerned with his intellectual greatness, but with his moral power over the hearts and minds of men. This is so vividly portrayed by the Irish orator, Grattan, that I cannot do better than give entire his estimate of the man. "The secretary stood alone. Modern degeneracy had not reached him. Original and unaccommodating, the features of his character had the hardihood of antiquity. His august mind over-awed majesty; and one of his sovereigns thought that royalty so impaired in his presence, that he conspired to remove him in order to be relieved from his superiority. No state chicanery, no narrow system of vicious politics sunk him to the vulgar level of the great; but overbearing, persuasive, and impracticable, his object was England, his ambition was fame. Without dividing, he destroyed party; without corrupting he made a venal age unanimous. France sunk beneath him. With one hand he smote the house of Bourbon, and wielded in his other hand the democracy of England. The sight of his mind was infinite, and his schemes were to effect, not England, not the present age only, but Europe and posterity." * * *

"A character so exalted, so strenuous, so various, so authoritative, astonished a corrupt age, and the treasury trembled at the name of Pitt, through all the classes of venality." * * * *

"Upon the whole there was something in this man that could create, subvert, or reform; an understanding, a spirit and an eloquence to summon mankind to society, or to break the bonds of slavery asunder, and to rule the wildness of free minds with unbounded authority, something that could establish or overwhelm an empire, and strike a blow in the world that should resound through the universe."

Again we ask, what is the secret of this persuasive power? What great moral force is that which he possesses that can turn the minds of his strongest opponents, annihilate their arguments, and make even royalty cower in his presence? It was said that no one ever heard him speak who did not feel that there was in him something finer than anything which he said. What is this mysterious something? As before, I answer, It is Character.

Yet another example. The old slave state of Virginia is justly proud of her most illustrious son, the gratefully remembered George Washington, "the man first in peace, first in war, first in the heart of his fellow-countrymen." Without dwelling on his early life let us look at the man. Where can we find his peer? Seldom has a mortal achieved as much. More seldom still has a mortal been held in such deserved veneration by his fellow-mortals. Who can estimate the far-reaching influence of such a man? Is it measurable according to our own poor standards? Does it not rather belong to the infinities? We know where it began, but who knows where or when it will end? Does it not widen as the ages roll on until it embraces in its mighty sweep all ages, all climes? Where is the soldier who is not a better soldier, whose pulse does not beat the quicker, when he remembers the calm, undaunted courage, the heroic endurance of the man! Where is the statesman who cannot profit by his experience and his wisdom? Ay, where is the man who does not feel morally elevated, and thus become a better man, on coming in contact with so lofty a soul? Green in his History of England gives this picture of him: "No nobler figure ever stood in the forefront of a nation's life. Washington was grave and courteous in address; his manners were simple and unpretending; his silence and the serene calmness of his temper spoke of a perfect self-mastery. But there was little in his outer bearing to reveal the grandeur of soul which lifts his figure, with all the simple majesty of an ancient statue out of the smaller passions, the meaner impulses of the world around him. It was only as the weary fight went on that the colonists discovered, however slowly and imperfectly, the greatness of their leader; his clear judgment, his heroic endurance, his silence under difficulties, his calmness in the hour of danger or defeat; the patience with which he waited, the quickness and hardness with which he struck, the lofty and serene sense of duty that never swerved from its task through resentment or jealousy; that never, through war or peace, felt the touch of a meaner ambition; that knew no aim save that of guarding the freedom of his fellow-countrymen, and no personal longing save that of returning to his own fireside when their freedom was secured."

John Quincy Adams also has this paragraph:

"Washington, the warrior and legislator. In war, contending by the wager of battle for the independence of his country, and for the freedom of the human race—ever manifesting amidst its horrors, by precept and by example, his reverence for the laws of peace, and for the tenderest sympathies of humanity; in peace, soothing the ferocious spirit of discord among his own countrymen into harmony and union, and giving to his sword a charm more potent than attributed in ancient times to the lyre of Orpheus."

Can we contemplate these pictures without being benefitted, without aspiring to the same glorious height, without the desire to see all that is low and mean and impure in ourselves and in humanity annihilated forever?

We ask again, what is the secret of this great power? What is it that raises him so far above the level of ordinary men? Is there not within him also, a certain "undemonstrable force" which asserts itself and stamps the man with the impress of greatness? Is it not true, that "somewhat resided in these men which begot an expectation that outran their performance?" "The largest part of their power was latent. This is that which we call Character—a reserved force which acts directly by presence, and without means."

In one of the backwoods settlements, not very many years ago, a small, square, low, flat-roofed log building was erected. The entrance was by a solitary door in one end. The four windows were small and firmly fastened up and down. The furniture in the only room was scanty and exceedingly rude in form and ruder in construction. The walls were without other ornament than whitewash and seldom that. This was an old-fashioned school house. But yet in this building, often not larger than 20x24 feet, must be crowded for six weary hours a day, from 60 to 80 pupils. How pleasant to think of inhaling for these long hours, the mingled breaths of so many! And yet this is what was expected of the martyr (man or woman) who volunteered to "keep school" in so delightful a retreat! There were many such martyrs in this country, in the not very distant past. Do you not know of one teacher who has given his life to his chosen vocation, to spend and to be spent in the service of others; one who, knowing thoroughly that scarcely in this life will he have more of this world's good things than will keep soul and body together, freely devotes himself to the work of elevating intellectually and morally that portion of humanity intrusted to him; one who, seeing in the work of the teacher, opportunities for impressing high moral principles upon human souls, scorns the meaner though more lucrative businesses of life; one who possesses in himself, the patience, energy, zeal, tact, yea, love for human souls, that will overcome all difficulties and make the man the true conqueror, the civilizer of the world? Are such teachers the product of a by-gone time—a time of more general ignorance and superstition surely, but a time when the desire for wealth had not taken so complete possession of men as the present? Has the noble species become extinct? I think not. There are many such in our own day. Look abroad and see. How many in our country? How many here to-day? If not many, why not?

What now distinguishes this man from the rank and file of his brethren? Is it not that there is in him something, that they do not possess? Is not this something the same as in those already considered, though perhaps differing in its expression? The largest part of his power also was latent. This is the undemonstrable force which we call Character.

Our Vicar.

Ah, how shall we proclaim his worth,
His virtues how unfold?
Of tender thoughts there is no dearth,
But written words are cold.

Nor gold, nor gems, nor purple fine
Hath fallen to his share,
Yet doth he own by right divine
Treasures to us more fair.

A meek and holy spirit set
A modest shrine within,
And eloquence whose pleading yet
Ne'er failed our hearts to win.

A mantle of humility
That's never cast aside,
A heart where truth and dignity
And charity abide.

A soul in which a constant flame
Of love for men burned clear,
In whose pure light a selfish aim
Ignoble must appear.

These gifts in perfect union blent
Have cast a wondrous spell
And many hearts to-day are rent
With grief too deep to tell.

But in their voicelessdepths will sleep
One germ as strong as death
A memory that will freshness keep
While love has life and breath.

The Hero of Stoney Creek.

The land of my song boasts no palaces olden—
No castles enchanted, no giants, no elves,
But meadows and orchards and harvest fields golden,
An I men with the skill to take care of themselves;
A land of broad lake and of deep rolling river,
Of mountain and valley and vine-covered strand,
Of cities that share in the trade of the nations,
And villages smiling all over the land.
The hill of my song is no mythical mountain
Of loadstone or magic where diamonds distil;
And the rill of my song is no fabulous fountain,
But a real stony creek that is Stoney Creek still.
My thome is the deed of a bold Stoney Creekan,
In the year eighteen-thirteen, the fifth day of June,
When he bought the whole army of Winder and Chandler
With a peck of green peas and a well whistled tune.

Tom Jones was a Yankee and true to the British
At Tyconderago when troubles were nigh,
His neighbors turned traitor and prayed Independence,
A spread-eagle saint born the Fourth of July.
And often when Tom was at work in his garden
He bore with their jeers till his anger would glow,
And he'd dash at a thistle as though 'twere a traitor,
And snap off its head with a stroke of his hoe.
When Britain gave up, and the U. E. L. heroes
Were rudely compelled from their homes to depart,
Tom sought Stoney Creek, then a forest unbroken,
A Yankee by birth, but a Briton at heart.

The years passed away like a dream of the morning,
Farm houses were built and the forests were cleared,
And far through the wide spreading, beautiful valley,
White harvest fields, meadows and orchard appeared.
The glad Stoney Creek leaping down from the mountain
Sang peace as it babbled o'er ledges and shelves;
The people were healthy and humble and happy,
Loved God and their neighbors as much as themselves.
And often when Tom was at work in his garden,
And quietly musing on years long ago,
He dauntingly christen a thistle a traitor,
And snap off its head with a stroke of his hoe.

In June eighteen-thirteen strange tu mult an rattle
Came up on the breeze from the valley below;
Like a war horse that scents from the distance a battle,
Tom started, stopped, listened, then threw down his hoe.
In a half-hour after Tom Jones with a basket,
Half full of green peas, as on business intent,
Was whistling the spread eagle tune, "Yankee Doodle,"
And standing in front of the general's tent
Tom's whistle was charming—the tune and the whistle
Had found him free passage right into the camp,
The peas were presented to Chandler and Wender,
Tom's object accomplished, he "reckoned he'd tramp."

To hie to his mare low and I catch his mare, Betty,
Was the work of a very few minutes at most
Tom knew that at Hamilton Harvey was stationed—
The minutes were precious, and not to be lost.
He leaped to Bet's back without an idle or bridle
But knew something weighty was moving his mind,
And galloped away through the mud and the mire,
As if the Old Harry was riding behind
A tavern looked tempting but Tom dare not tarry,
But half turned aside, then all foaming sped on;
And the sun was just slipping behind the far mountain
As Tom galloped into the camp of Sir John
The tale was soon told, and the drums were soon beating,
The army soon marching with Tom at its head;
And long before morning the Yankees were captured—
A score or two wounded—a score or two dead.

Tom Jones won a name that will not be forgotten—
Be peace to his memory, rest to his bones!
Sir John won a field, losing hardly a soldier;
Stoney Creek won a hero—his name was Tom Jones.

Better Late Than Never.

In 1873 a man named Wilson, who lives in Oshawa, was robbed of a gold watch and $4 in cash and the thief was never detected. On Tuesday Mr. Wilson received a package by express from the State of Indiana, and upon opening it he found the watch along with a cheque for the money stolen, together with interest from the date of the robbery.

The late Dr. Austin Flint, Professor in Bellevue Hospital Medical College, Fellow of the New York Academy of Medicine, member of the State medical societies of New York, Virginia, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, etc., says in speaking of advanced kidney disease (or Bright's): "Fatal termination is many times due to pericarditis (heart disease), apoplexy, difficult breathing, dropsy." The foregoing are but symptoms of diseases. That being the case there is nothing absurd in the claim made by the proprietors of Warner's Safe Cure that they prevent apoplexy and cure heart disease, etc., with Warner's Safe Cure. Why? Because it removes the cause of disease, and when the cause is removed the symptom called a disease is cured.

ESTELLE'S INFATUATION:

A NOVEL.

It was curious how rational, alive, coherent she had become. Her face was flushed, her large eyes were feverishly bright, her whole being seemed strung and stirred. She was herself and yet not herself. Her mind was no longer clouded and oppressed, and yet it was not sane nor healthy. Not the living log—the organized statue—she was more like an incarnate flame, self-consuming and self-destroying. Yet none of the dear people around her—all loving her as they did, but all inexperienced in the phases of her malady—feared the consequences of this sudden reaction. On the contrary, they rejoiced in her renewed lucidity, and even Lady Elizabeth did not read the signs aright.

"But why am I in bed, Liese?" she asked. "I am quite well. Let me get up. Let me go out. I am well. Why am I kept here?"

"You shall get up, darling," said her friend. "It is better for you."

Lady Elizabeth did not remind her that it was by her own wilful refusal to rise and dress that she was here to-day, as now for some days past. She was too glad to see the signs of improvement, as she read them, to argue about responsibilities. So Estelle's new wish was gratified, and she dressed and came into the sitting-room before Anthony had got rid of the traces of his journey and had refreshed himself as Englishmen do.

All that day Estelle was in the same state—vivid, alert, feverish—insane. But with the preternatural cunning of insanity she concealed her state with the skill of a finished actress, and no one but an expert would have seen her real condition behind her assumed brightness and responsiveness. Her eyes, however, would have betrayed her to those who could read them. Unsteady, quick, suspicious, watchful, they had in them all the well-known distrust and slyness of her state, and belied the more favorable symptoms of her lucid speech. Here only in shape and color, they had not a trace of their former expression. They were the eyes of a maniac, with just so much conscious intelligence as enabled her to feign for better concealment. She startled Anthony, and more than startled him, by saying suddenly, abruptly, with nothing to lead up to it:

"When I left Thrift I went to Mary Crosby's, and hid there for years, I think. She is Mrs. Latimer's daughter, and gave us money. They were cheating us at home, and bribed me to keep the secret."

Then she laughed, in a mindless, foolish way, with a note of maliciousness in the discord.

Nothing that she could have said would have so disturbed her hearers as this apparent cynicism. How changed she was to be able to make this shameless confession!

"How long were you there?" asked Anthony, turning away his eyes.

She glanced at him furtively, and a look of suspicion came over her face.

"I do not remember," she said, shortly, and for some time after this relapsed into silence and would not speak.

So the day wore on, and nightfall came. Anthony had not been able to speak to Lady Elizabeth apart, and Caleb had wandered away into the hills, like one whose work was done. He was no longer wanted; and he felt himself an obstacle, an encumbrance, where so lately he had been the guardian and preserver. But Estelle evidently missed him, and looked round the room and to the door more than once, not saying what she wanted, but showing that she was uneasy about something. When he returned toward evening she looked pleased, but did not speak, and Lady Elizabeth—Anthony notwithstanding said kindly, to give him pleasure, the poor omad'haun, "We have missed you, Mr. Stagg, and so has our dear invalid."

"I am glad that I am not only a nuisance, Lady Elizabeth," said Caleb, blushing to the tips of his ears. "I thought I might be in the way, and so just took myself off that you might be shot of me."

"We owe you too much ever to find you a nuisance or in the way," she replied, with great kindness. "Why, what should we have done without you?"

"I am main glad," said Caleb; and even Anthony had to recognize the dog-like and unselfish devotion which lifted the miner's son out of the category of men of whom to be jealous, and put him into that of sexless saints. When the night had fully come and the activities of the day were over, Estelle got up and went over to Lady Elizabeth.

"I am tired, Liese," she said abruptly. "I am going to bed."

"Very well, dear, I will go with you," was the answer. "We do not leave her," she said, turning to Anthony. "Either I or the maid is always with her."

"I will watch by her to-night," said Anthony, in his authoritative way.

Estelle clutched at Lady Elizabeth's dress like a child.

"No, Liese," she said.

"Perhaps—" began Lady Elizabeth.

"I wish it," said Anthony; and no more was to be said. It was his will, and he had the right—was he not her master by the law? His heart was heavy as lead, and his hopes had died down almost as soon as they had grown up. His Dead Sea apple had proved its bitterness. The light of his life was quenched; the woman he had loved and still loved—the woman whom he would have taken back in the face of the world—was but a living death, whose heart was in the grave of another. Nevertheless he would watch by her to-night—tenderly as a mother by the cradle of her first-born—carefully as a miser guarding his treasure—mournfully as one who watches the dead. And when to-morrow came he would decide on his plans. In any case, these included an immediate return to England and the advice of experts. He would not believe that her state was irremediable. By judicious treatment her mental health and moral sanity would be restored, and years of happiness were yet before him. If the neighbors looked coldly on her, he would leave Thrift and go where their sad story was not known. She should never be reminded of her fault. It had been grave and damnable, but she had not been to blame. She had been weak, not wicked; that scoundrel who, fortunately for himself, had died before vengeance had overtaken him, was the only one to blame. So he sat and thought, watching her pale impassive face for hours into the night, when, overpowered by the heat of the silent night, by the fatigue of travel, and the exhaustion consequent on his own emotions, his head sunk on the bed beside her own, and he fell heavily asleep.

Then Estelle opened her eyes and looked at him, first with a shudder and then a smile. She slid her hands in among her coils of hair, which she dragged from their fastenings as she took from among them a small phial, which she uncorked.

"They shall not separate us, Charlie!" she said softly to herself, her eyes strained up to the ceiling of the room while she drank the contents of that little bottle to the last drop. She was smiling, and her face had a rapt ecstatic look, for there, visible to her eyes, she saw the face of the one she loved, beautified, glorified, freed from all trace of suffering and disease, looking at her with love, while his hands were held out as if to receive her. Then, still smiling, her eyes still fixed, a change came over her. Her heart ceased to beat, her blood ceased to flow; what visions or what thoughts possessed her no man could know, for the thing we call the life had gone, and she lay on the bed motionless and dead.

When Anthony awoke he found her stiff and cold. Her eyes were still opened wide and lips were parted with a smile. Her curling hair fell over the pillow and her arms like a cloud, and in her white hand, with the long taper fingers still crossed, was hidden a little bottle drained to the last drop and smelling of bitter almonds. By this she had secured the swift passage she desired and had meditated; and by this she had passed from the night of her bondage to the glad day of her release.

CHAPTER XIII.

UNMASKED.

Mary Crosby, for the most part ready for any emergency, was rather at the end of her resources. Mrs. Latimer had been inconsiderate enough to have an attack of congestion of the lungs, which necessitated careful examination by the doctor, threatened fatal consequences, and made it absolutely necessary for one who was only a servant to adopt an above-board and straightforward kind of behavior. A nurse was insisted on by the medical man, and Mary was ordered to communicate her state to Mrs. Latimer's natural belongings. When he was told the old lady's reputed age the doctor gave the chronicler the direct lie, and docked off 20 years at a blow.

"She was no more past eighty than he was," he said, scornfully, wondering what was at the back of the fraud, and angry that such a cheat should have been sought to be played off on him, but most of all indignant that he should have been taken for a fool. What did it mean? Why should this woman of 60 odd, and vigorous for her age, seek to make herself 20 years older? and why should the hands of one presumably a lady show signs of hard work and rough usage? A mystery was behind these appearances, and he went to Mr. Trotter for such insight as he ought to give. As the clergyman who had so frequently paid his offical visits and administered godly consolation, he might have some clew. But Mr. Trotter was a student whose books had given him lore, not knowledge, and he was of no use as a detective adjutant. Nevertheless, he was brought to a proper state of doubt and suspicion, and Mary knew that the net was closing round her. Not to send word to the Clanricardes was to confess to the packed cards and loaded dice of her game. To have them here—even that foolish George—was to be discovered as sure as fate. But the doctor insisted, the clergyman exhorted, the nurse refused the responsibility; and, like the general stir which sent the pig over the stile, and the old woman to her supper, when the dog began to worry the cat, and the cat began to eat the rat, the pressure of events was too strong for the obstructing sentinel, and the Clanricardes had to be communicated with. The letter was sent just at the time when Mrs. Clanricarde, her toilette finally completed, was preparing to go over to Mentone, but was hindered by the news of Estelle's sudden death—which she wept over as heart-breaking and characterized as inconvenient. So that, when she found that old Mrs. Latimer was dangerously ill, the sense of hope and relief which it brought went far to mitigate her sorrow by reducing the weight of its inconvenience.

"You must go at once, George," said Mrs. Clanricarde to her husband, speaking in her sharp, peremptory way.

"And you, my Louise?" he asked, amiably, turning his other cheek as was his wont.

At first she answered No, she would not go. There was no necessity for it. She disliked the act of travelling, and there was nothing to be got by this journey. If Mrs. Latimer died—she died, and they would come in for the money; but then she reflected that perhaps the servant might lay pilfering hands on unconsidered trifles, which that foolish George would never see, and which it needed a woman of perspicacity to discover. So she suddenly resolved on going too, and she made her husband understand how great the effort was and how direful she felt the necessity to be, all owing to his ingrained stupidity. To which he answered, rather dryly: "What a pity your mother blundered, my Louise! She spoiled the making of a man in you."

"Yes," said Louise, as dryly. "A better man than I have found in you."

"To my sorrow," said George.

"To something more than sorrow with me," was her reply, in her high-pitched, French voice, with its accent of complaint and irritated inflection.

When they arrived at the house they were met by Mary Crosby, who opened the door to them and ushered them into the front drawing-room. Duels are none the less deadly when conducted with courtesy; and this was Mary Crosby's thought if put into different words. Hence she paid these two enemies—greater enemies than they themselves yet knew—the most flattering court, and at a bound won that foolish George's heart, and established herself therein as a really good and superior person. Mrs. Clanricarde was more cautious. She could read far better than could her husband; and the hidden nature of this resolute, hard-visaged woman, with the square jaw, compressed lips, searching eyes, and general hardness of demeanor, was scarcely in accord with her soft words and boundless attentions; and being in this disaccord, her cares awakened more suspicion than gave pleasure.

Questioned about Mrs. Latimer, she had the melancholy intelligence to give of imminent danger and extreme debility. When she said this she put up her apron to her eyes and shed genuine tears, while Mr. and Mrs. Clanricarde looked at each other, and not even that soft-hearted George could find words of condolence on the spur of the moment. They came after consideration. But really even he thought that an old creature, long past 80, who had been standing for the last 10 years in the shoes which he wanted to wear, and which were rightfully his, had had long enough innings, and that the time had come when she ought to retire. He murmured, however, something that sounded like pity and condolence; but Mary caught the pretence in his voice and noted the silence of Mrs. Clanricarde, and wondered, in a rapid kind of way, whether she could escape detection if she were to put arsenic in their tea and throw them off the scent forever—that scent which was now so burning!

"Has Mrs. Latimer left a will?" asked Mrs. Clanricarde.

"I don't know, ma'am," Mary answered; "she has never talked much to me about her affairs."

"Where are the bronzes and old china my cousin collected?" then inquired Mr. Clanricarde.

"I don't know, sir," was the glib reply. "When we left London Mrs. Latimer had them all packed up and sent away. I know nothing more of them."

"Are they warehoused or at the bank?" asked George.

That I really can't say, sir," answered Mary,

"But you were her confidential servant," said Mrs. Clanricarde, sharply.

"A servant is never really in the confidence of her mistress," answered Mary, demurely. "Ladies like Mrs. Latimer tell us little things, but not great ones, and I know no more of my lady's affairs than you do. And not so much," she added, without a blush.

"It is very odd," then said Mrs. Clanricarde, more and more uneasy and suspicious, seeing in this absence of costly art treasures the first act of denudation. "I cannot understand it."

"Perhaps she has left some notice—some instruction," said Mary. "She had a lot of papers, I know."

"Where?" asked Mrs. Clanricarde.

"In a box upstairs," said Mary.

So there were—old love letters, and business papers relating to the early lives of the dead and gone Latimers, but of aught that should be of use or prove a clew in the present condition of things not a trace. Not even a check-book nor a banker's book shed light on receipts, savings, or expenditure, and when things came to be looked into, of the last quarter's annuity not more than five pounds were left for current expenses. But Mary's house-keeping expenses were plain and correct to the last farthing, and each week tallied with the amount set down with scrupulous fidelity, as, "Received from Mrs. Latimer, £2," or "£2 10s.," sometimes "£3," and for a long time as much as "£5," or even more.

"Why is this so high?" asked Mrs. Clanricarde, when she glanced over the book.

"Mrs. Latimer had two young friends," said Mary, with consummate self-possession. "They came and stayed here for a couple of months or more."

"Who were they?" was the next question.

Mary hesitated for a moment; then she suddenly decided on her line of action. She had never been quite sure what she should do if this question came to be put to her—whether she should boldly confess, and so, as it were, bribe the father and mother to silence, or gloss it over into an insignificant visit of indifferent people. She did not know that Estelle was dead, and Mrs. Clanricarde's mourning might mean any one besides a daughter. Acting, then, on half knowledge, she made a bold move, and said, quietly, "Mr. Charles Osborne, ma'am, and young Mrs. Harford."

"Infamous wretch! and you say that to me, her mother, to my face!" cried Mrs. Clanricarde, rising and facing the woman standing there calm, a little sneering malicious and triumphant.

"I could not let them starve," said Mary, tossing up her head. "They had no money, and Mrs. Latimer took them in out of pure compassion. If their own deserted them, and left them on the streets, Mrs. Latimer was too kind to do so too. That was how the money went, Mrs. Clanricarde; and more to the back of the weekly bills, I can tell you! Those two nearly ruined my poor mistress, and took, to my knowledge, every halfpenny she had saved. And she had saved something that would have come in handy now with all these expenses about."

"Wretches!" said Mrs. Clanricarde, strongly agitated. "I shall give you in charge of the police, Mary. You shall be put in prison as sure as you are alive."

"Very well, ma'am," said Mary; "and let the whole story come out in open court. I am willing, I am sure. I have done nothing to be ashamed of, and if you, a mother, choose to bring the story forward, I'll not back out of it. But I'd warn you to think twice before you do. It's an ugly story at the best."

"Leave the room, you wretch! you sinful and abominable woman!" cried Mrs. Clanricarde; and Mary, saying, as her parting shot, "And this is the gratitude of the quality!" beat a speedy retreat, glad to be relieved from the heckling she had undergone. As she went out of the room she met the doctor and the nurse coming down the stairs.

"It is all over!" they said. "The poor lady has gone."

Mary gave a sharp cry.

"I should have so liked to see her again!" she said, passionately weeping. "She was always a good mistress to me! I should have liked to see her once more."

"Too late now," said the doctor; and "She is in heaven," added the nurse.

"She deserved it, if any one ever did," said Mary, sobbing; and the doctor, with a half-smile in his eyes, went into the room to inform Mr. and Mrs. Clanricarde, the nearest of kin, and the deceased lady's heirs, of the demise of their relation, who passed for over 80, and was certainly 15 years younger, and whose hands bore the traces of hard work and rough usage.

Then said Mrs. Clanricarde, enlightened as by a sudden revelation, "George, we have been robbed! Call the police. This woman was not Mrs. Latimer, and Mary Crosby is the thief!"

CHAPTER XIV.

AT BAY.

The game was up, but Mary stood her ground. "You may do your worst," she said, defiantly, when she was haled before the authorities assembled in the drawing-room; "and your worst will not do you much good."

As yet the police had not been sent for until Mr. Harford had been summoned home.

"Now that mother has gone, I care nothing about any of you," said Mary, slightly snapping her fingers. "I kept her warm and comfortable for her lifetime, and I can do my 7 years, or even 10, if need be, now I am by myself."

"You are a shameless wretch!" said Mrs. Clanricarde, almost tearful from anger.

"Shameless yourself!" retorted Mary, flinging back the words like a bullet. "Me and mother didn't sell a poor young lady for money to a man she cared for no more than a sack of potatoes. We didn't make a fine young gentleman dead when he wasn't, and bring a heap of misery and misfortune to every one all round."

"Silence, woman!" thundered Anthony, his face as dark as a demon's.

"No, Mr. Harford, sir," said Mary; "it is no time now for silence. You and yours have got to hear the truth. If I have to fight for my life I'll fight all I know, as anybody would who'd got it to do. I am sorry to hurt you; but you'll have to be hurt."

"What excuse can you make, you wretched creature, you thief, for cheating us out of the money that belonged to us all these years!" cried Mrs. Clanricarde, still almost beside herself from the morified rage of one who has been balked and dispossessed.

"What excuse? A sight better than you can give for your selling of your daughter," said Mary. "We kept Master Charlie for years, did we; and we kept Mr. Harford's wife for nigh a year. It was we as paid for everything—their food here, Mrs. Harford's very boots and under-linen, and for their expenses out there. We kept them, I say, and did better with the money than any one of you would, I reckon."

"That does not make it less a theft, Mary," said George Clanricarde, mildy.

Some one had to speak, and it seemed his turn.

"That may be, sir," said Mary, a little less insolently; "but it makes a difference how you use the money. We lived poorly, did mother and me, and all we saved we gave to Master Charlie to let him marry Miss Estelle; or to Mrs. Harford when she ran away."

This was not true, but it served its purpose as well as if it had been. That good fat sum at last taken out of the mattress and invested in Consols, the bonds whereof deposited in the county bank, under the name of Molly Dance, could have told a different story had any one known it.

"How dare you speak of Mrs. Harford!" said Anthony, in white heat. "Mrs. Harford dependent on you!"

"Truth is truth, sir," Mary answered, sullenly. "Your good lady had no one else to see her through her trouble, and we did, mother and me. I don't think we deserve ballyragging from any of you for that same," she added, with a false air of whimpering. "She came to us, poor young lady, in her trouble. What were we to do? Turn her out into the streets, or take care of her? Mother and me talked it over, but we thought it would be a treacherous sort of thing to do to turn her back, when she trusted us. So we kept her secret, and no one was the wiser. It's not every one would have done so much, though I says it as shouldn't."

"No," returned Mrs. Clanricarde, with a virtuous scoff. "It is not every honest woman that would have harbored a runaway wife and her paramour."

"They did kindly," said that foolish George, his restless eyes full of tears.

"They did damnably," said Anthony, warmly.

"And you would have had us betray Master Charlie Osborne, who was like my own?" fired up Mary. "You would have us send for you, and let you do with that poor young gentleman what you would, and treat that poor young lady like a Tory? No, Mr. Harford, sir, I know my duty to God and my neighbors better than that; and I hope I shall always be done by as I have done to others."

"Your duty to God!" flamed out Anthony. "Your duty to the devil, you mean."

There was silence. If Mary's eloquence had not reached the hearts of her hearers, the father's emotion had at least shamed the mother to quiescence, and Anthony's large words had removed from his bosom some of his own perilous stuff. For all his momentary excitement against the woman who had harbored his wife in her sin, he was substantially softened to the deed. Remembering what he had felt in the early days, he knew that Mary and her mother had kept him from committing a crime and had saved two lives—if but for more prolonged suffering. He felt, morever, that all this dirty linen had best be washed at home. To give Mary into custodyand to have her committed for trial would be to flood the world with scandalous details, at once ridiculous and nauseous. It would be better to compound the felony and let her go free.

For all that he was a magistrate, and so far bound to obey the law he administered, Anthony's American experience had made him more individual than social; and he was so mafioso to the extent of liking to settle his own affairs with his own right hand, rather than have them settled for him by judge and jury and afterward analyzed by the press.

His difficulty at the present moment was not to let Mary see that he was inclined to her deliverance for fear of the world's talk and for the instinct of self-preservation, but to wrap up the truth in an opaque envelope of part gratitude for the care taken of his erring wife, part consideration for the woman herself, qua woman, and so recently afflicted. It was not possible for him to show the truth. How often, indeed, can any of us?

Mary was the first to break the silence. As astute as she was insolent, she saw the situation clearly enough, and she would let them know that she saw it.

(To be Continued).

According to Peter Henderson, ordinary stable manure is yet almost exclusively used by the market gardeners of Hudson County, N.J., and that at the rate of seventy-five tons to the acre. Very little phosphate or other concentrated manures are used on lands continually under tillage.

The Johnstown Flood.

I.

The rhythmic ring of a horse's feet
Echoes along the city street,
And the idle crowd swarms out to see
Whom can the reckless rider be.

With bloodless face and blazing eyes
He dashes on, and wildly cries
"Fly, for the river's wrath is near!
Fly, for the Flood—the Flood is here!"

He passes, and they stand amazed;
Then jest, and deem the rider crazed—
Some mischief-breeding addlepate—
Then turn and see, and fly—too late!

II.

With a moan and a groan,
With a shriek and a roar,
Down on the town
The waters pour—
A shivering crash,
And it is no more!

The torrent sweeps on its changeless path,
Grinding the puny walls like chaff,
In its awful play.
Like straws before the fresh'ning breeze,
Like sands beneath the beating seas,
They pass away.

The seething whirlpool boils and foams
Above a thousand ruined homes,
And on its bosom sped,
All ghastly in waning light,
Are borne into the coming night
An army of the dead.

III.

Tears for the souls that passed away;
But charity for those
Whose all was lost that bitter day;
Whose call for pity goes
Up from hearts that are sad and sore,
And laden down with woes;
Tears for the lives that are no more,
But charity for those.

The Song of the Advertiser.

I am an advertiser great;
In letters bold, and big and round,
The praises of my wares I sound;
Prosperity is my estate.

The people come,
The people go
In one continuous,
Surging flow.

They buy the goods and come again,
And I'm the happiest of men;
And this the reason I relate:
I am an advertiser great!

There is a shop across the way
Where ne'er is heard a human tread,
Where trade is paralyzed and dead,
Where ne'er a customer a day.

The people come,
The people go—
But never there;
They do not know

There's such a shop beneath the skies,
Because he does not advertise;
While I with pleasure contemplate
That I'm an advertiser great.

The secret of my fortune lies
In one small fact, which I may state,
Too many tradesmen learn too late;
If I have goods to advertise!

Then people come,
And people go,
In constant streams—
For people know

That he who has good wares to sell
Will surely advertise them well;
And proudly I reiterate,
I am an advertiser great!

"LITTLE FLOY."

"Open wide the golden portals,
Swing the pearly gates afar;
Hail her coming with glad music,
Light up every twinkling star,
Lo! she comes, returning homeward—
Cherubs, wave your wings for joy—
Comes the little truant angel,
Star-eyed, white-robed Little Floy.

"Downward on a mission went she,
With her playmate, gentle Spring;
Hand in hand they wandered earthward,
She with closely folded wing.
Earthly eyes with love were blinded,
Earthly hearts were filled with joy,
And they never knew an angel
Was the fairy, Little Floy.

"But the little feet grew weary;
Drooped their blossom day by day;
And with aching heart they watched her,
Knowing well she could not stay.
We can pity earthly sorrow,
But with us there's naught but joy—
Open wide the golden portals—
Welcome, welcome, Little Floy!"

The Eiffel Tower.

The whole tower could be lifted by four men of average strength. The case has been proved. When it was about half its present height a few men actually did lift it. This is not humbug; the thing is perfectly simple. The construction of the tower is based on the cantilever principle, and its bulk of 6,400 tons is so adjusted as to press on the foundation with less weight than that of a man in an arm-chair on the floor.

Is the tower beautiful? No. But it has the erect, fragile-looking elegance of an obelisk not hewn out of red granite, but knit of dark-hued meshes.—Emile Michelet in Paris Illustre.

A Mother's Vision.

Jennie Wright, the 9-year-old daughter of a canal boatman, fell from the boat into the water off the Hoboken shore on Thursday. A search was made for the body, but it was fruitless. During the night Mrs. Wright sprang up in her bed, exclaiming, "I see the body of my child at the stern of the boat." The grappling hooks were brought into use, and the body was taken from the spot where the woman had seen it in her dream.—Newark (N. J.) Advertiser.

The Young Fiend Again.

"There is nothing sentimental about Mary," said Mrs. Palmer. "Even when her lover is with her they sit far apart."

"Yes," spoke up little Harry, "as long as you are in the room."

Electrocute—Electrocuting—Electrocuted.

Electrocution is the new word, which means what it says, and is therefore rapidly becoming popular with all persons except murderers.

Dr. R. A. Gunn, M. D., Dean and Professor of Surgery of the United States Medical College, Editor of the "Medical Tribune," author of "Gunn's New Improved Handbook of Hygiene and Domestic Medicine," says: "Belonging as I do to a branch of the profession which believes that no School of Medicine knows all the truth regarding disease, and being independent enough to use any remedy that will help my patients without reference to the source from which it comes, I am willing to acknowledge and commend thus frankly the value of Warner's Safe Cure.

A Spicy Lecture for Husbands on Home Duties.

Courtesies That mean Something When They are Reciprocal—The Head of the Household is often too Exclusive in His Conduct—Why not be Sociable at Home?

One can seldom pick up a paper of miscellaneous reading without coming across advice to wives to spend the major part of their existence in striving to retain their husband's love and admiration. Unquestionably this is right, and no good wife with a good husband but will find it her supreme delight, as well as duty, to daily strengthen the sweet cords that bind them together. But there are other sides to the question—shadowy, gloomy sides—and it is toward those wives who are consigned to dwell perennially in the gray, somber lives their lords and masters make for them that I am impelled to say my say.

"Meet him at the door with a smile and a kiss"—that is an old, beautiful and sensible piece of advice that every wife in this country ought to be encouraged and able to carry out from the very depths of her heart, but, alas! that only the husbands who are in the minority deserve.

WHISPERING IN THE HUSBANDS' EARS.

Suppose—and I call upon hundreds, aye, thousands, of wives in our midst to witness if I do not draw a picture they recognize all too readily—the wife has been up and down all night with the croupy baby, while its father lay comfortably asleep. Well, take this wife, who, after the night's anxiety, loss of rest and fatigue, has to get up and prepare breakfast, attend to all her usual duties with a splitting headache, caused by sleeplessness and consequent irritability of the stomach, that utterly loathes the idea of even toast and coffee, while her handsome, well dressed, well fed husband goes off for the day with a "Well, I'm off; take care of yourself!" Think you she will feel much like meeting him with a bright, cheerful, sunny smile and a kiss when he comes in, perhaps a half hour later than usual, with his greeting: "Haven't you had dinner yet? What did you wait for me for? You know I detest having you wait."

I wish I could get the ear of the general masculine public for just a little while and whisper into it that perhaps it would be quite as well if the husbands took a little more pains to retain their wives' respect and affection. According to the inevitable law of nature a woman cannot be happy unless somebody loves her, enthrones her, crowns her and lets her know in unmistakable language that such is the case. I have heard men say: "Of course I love my wife. What do you take me for—a brute?" Well, no; not exactly such a detestable thing, or that delicate, ladylike little wife of yours never would have married you. But there is a resemblance between you and that quadruped in the fact that brutes never speak their feelings. Of what use to me is a gold mine in Australia or a diamond field in Brazil if the riches of them are not quarried? Where is the sense or reason of your loving your wife if you never speak of it, or look it, or act it? In fact, you don't love her if you do none of these things, for if there is a truer aphorism than that "murder will out" it is that love cannot be concealed.

I am well aware of the argument in favor of the sterner sex—that they are all day exposed to the friction of business, and, when night comes, they ought to be received into a quiet, peaceful, happy home, where they may don slippers and smoking jacket, and read or doze on the library lounge until bedtime. Very good. But your wife is all day subjected to something far worse than the contact with business annoyances, and that is the monotonous, endless routine of domestic drudgery, which, home keeper, home lover that she is, wears and tears on the sensitive nerves in a way few men appreciate. When evening comes, the babies are asleep, she wants a little exhilarating change, something rather more effervescent than the pleasure of feeling alone in the same rooms she has occupied all day, watching the handsome features of her recumbent lord, or immersed in the columns of a newspaper.

ON THE COSTLY MONUMENT.

Now, which shall it be? The husband's comfort or the wife's? I can tell you the result. It will be the survival of the fittest, and as he is the stronger physically and gets plenty of air and exercise the chances are nine hundred and ninety-nine out of a thousand that before his eldest child is in its teens there will be a costly monument in some silent resting place—"Sacred to the memory of my beloved wife." While, if God's own truth were carved on that pure, white cross in letters of blazing gold, they would read: "A woman's life wasted: a heart disappointed unto death; hopes destroyed—by little things."

Yes, little things! I know a husband, a bright, intellectual man, who is killing his wife by his "philosophy," he calls it, that he never fails to air upon every occasion when his wife is in distress or disappointment or trouble. No matter how keenly she feels any pain, physical or emotional, he invariably freezes her with his formula: "Well, what are you going to do about it?" Never a loving word of sympathy, a kiss or a caress—and yet he'd be insulted if you told him he didn't love her—never a word, "It is too bad, dear; but as it is unavoidable, can't I help you to bear it?" I know that wife would sacrifice ten years of her life if she could get out of her mind that cold, judicial, unsympathetic tone of voice and look that she will carry with her into eternity.

When that husband is in straits, which he often is, and is depressed physically, for he is not in good health, and unstrung nervously, as is often the case; when his famous cold-hearted "What are you going to do about it?" is temporarily silenced—that wife of his, that he never did deserve and is killing by degrees, is all gentle, womanly sympathy, constant attention, tender ministration and hopeful encouragement. And the next time he recovers the full force of his gigantic intellect, and it is her turn to reap a reward, it comes like Banquo's ghost upon her, "I don't see what you are going to do about it."

But perhaps the wife to be most pitied is she whose husband, while mean, smally abusive and tyrannical in little things—who treats her off and on as if she were his head servant without a salary, instead of his equal in head and heart, whose petty discourtesies and inattentions, familiar though they are, always cause the same hopeless pang of despair to chill her heart—this husband who, when company is around, is so sweet, and polite, and elegant, and joking, and complimentary to her. And she, trying to forget the parting words, perhaps, of the morning: "Understand this, the next time you invite company I wish to be formally consulted, as I believe I run this ranch"—cannot to save her immortal soul, look or feel pleased when at table that man tells the guests "how he enjoys the delightful surprises his dear little wife gets up so nicely. Fine cook, isn't she? I tell you she beats my mother, and I thought she was the best cook in the world. Let me give you this choice bit of white meat, darling, shall I?"—Mme. Emerce in New York Star.

The Attraction of a Soft Voice.

We agree with that old poet who said that a low, soft voice was an excellent thing in woman. Indeed, we feel inclined to go much further than he has on the subject and call it one of her crowning charms. No matter what other attractions she may have; she may be as fair as the Trojan Helen, and as learned as the famous Hypatia of ancient times; she may have all the accomplishments considered requisite at the present day and every advantage that wealth may procure, and yet if she lack a low, sweet voice she can never be really fascinating. How often the spell of beauty is broken by loud, coarse talking. How often you are irresistibly drawn to a plain, unassuming woman, whose soft, silvery tones render her positively attractive. Besides, we fancy we can judge of the character by the voice; the bland, smooth, fawning tone seems to us to betoken deceit and hypocrisy as invariably as the musical, subdued voice indicates a genuine refinement. In the social circle how pleasant it is to hear a woman talk in that low key which always characterizes the true lady. In the sanctuary of home how such a voice soothes the fretful temper and cheers the weary husband. How sweetly such cadence floats through the sick chamber and around the dying bed; with what a solemn melody do they breathe a prayer for a departing soul.—New York Telegram.

She had a Word or Two to Say.

A fast young man decided to make to a young lady a formal offer of his hand and heart—all he was worth—hoping for a cordial reception. He cautiously prefaced his declarations with a few questions, for he had no intention of "throwing himself away." Did she love him well enough to live in a cottage with him? Was she a good cook? Did she think it a wife's duty to make a home happy? Would she consult his tastes and wishes concerning her associates and pursuits in life? Was she economical? Could she make her own clothes? etc. The young lady said that before she answered his questions, she would assure him of some negative virtues she possessed. She never drank, smoked or chewed; never owed a bill to her laundress or tailor; never stayed out all night playing billiards; never lounged on the street corners and ogled giddy girls; never "stood in" with the boys for cigars or wine suppers. "Now," said she, rising indignantly, "I am assured, by those who know, that you do all these things, and it is rather absurd for you to expect all the virtues in me, while you do not possess any yourself. I can never be your wife;" and she bowed him out and left him on the cold doorstep, a madder if not a wiser man.—Health Journal.

Insects in the Ear.

Dr. J. Herbert Claiborne, jun., talking in "The Medical Classics" about removing insects from the ear, expresses the belief that "sweet oil is perhaps the best thing to keep the insect from moving. That is the first desideratum. The oil, by its thick consistence, will so entangle and bedraggle the insect's legs and wings that the intolerable noise will be stopped. If oil be not at hand use any liquid that is not poisonous or corrosive. Water will probably be within the reach of every one. This is also more liable to float him out, too, than either sweet oil or glycerine. It has been suggested to blow tobacco smoke in the ear to stupefy the insect. We cannot indorse this advice; tobacco smoke blown into the ear of a child has been known to cause alarming symptoms. When the movements of the intruder have been arrested syringe the ear gently with warm water. All manner of insects and bugs have been found in the ear, but you can never tell in a given case who the rude caller is knocking at the door of your brain until you have him out."

Too Literal.

Mr. Jones came home the other night feeling somewhat discouraged. Sitting down by the register, he leaned his head disconsolately on his hand and sighed.

"I believe I'll throw up the sponge," he said, dejectedly.

"Good gracious, Jeptha, is that what became of the sponge," said Mrs. Jones. "I hunted high and low for it. When did you swallow it?"

Military Inspection.

Gen. Sir Fred Middleton will inspect the military camp at Niagara on the 18th inst. He will afterwards inspect the Royal Military College at Kingston and "A" Battery of Artillery. From Kingston he will go to Gananoque, proceeding afterwards to the camps at St. John, Que., and Sorel. It is probable that he will visit British Columbia in the autumn.

The Difference.

Gentleman—And what are you in for, my good man?

Convict IIII—Fer takin' pictures, sir.

"Mercy, I didn't know thot photography was a crime."

"It isn't, sir; but takin' ile pictures is."

Came to an Agreement at Once.

Husband—Wife, I wish you had been born with as good judgment as I, but I fear you were not.

Wife—You are right. Our choice of partners for life convinces me that your judgment is much better than mine.

PIGS IN CLOVER.

The Famous Problem Said to Be the Outcome of a Scientific Experiment.

Emil Charles Pfeiffer, of Cambridge, states that a student of physiological psychology named Martenfeldt is the culprit who is responsible for the "Pigs in Clover" atrocity, says an exchange. Martenfeldt had been making researches in some determinations of the sensitiveness of the tactile sense under the direction of the great Helmholtz, and found that the ability to balance a marble on a perfectly smooth piece of plate glass depended upon the delicacy of what is known as the reaction time, that is, depends upon the quickness of the nerve-current in receiving the impression that the marble will roll, sending the impression to the controlling organs in the cerebellum that contract or relax the muscles of the arm and the degree of responsiveness in the nervous end-organs of the fingers which hold the piece of glass. Martenfeldt found that if he placed the marble in the centre of the plate and marked four or five spots on the edges of the plate and then asked the subject with which he experimented to tip the plate so that the marble would run across a particular spot, a considerable time elapsed before the subject could determine how to tip the plate to make a marble roll as required. When Martenfeldt complicated the apparatus and placed rings of pasteboard about the centre of the plate, with holes for the marble to run through, the average results of his experiments gave a remarkable psychological law, which was that the "reaction time" depended upon the size of the circles of pasteboard which made an impression upon the field of vision of the retina, and was in direct proportion to the diameters of the circles expressed in millimteres. He sent one of his plates to Dr. Herman Meyer, of Philadelphia, where it was seen by C. M. Crandall, the toy deviser.

English and French Cookery.

A celebrated French traveller remarked the English have fifty religions and only one sauce. This, no doubt, shows ignorance as to religion, but a great deal of truth as regards the sauce, which, probably, was referred to as the very innocent concoction of a white sauce consisting either of some flour, butter, and milk, or some bread and milk, both equally tasteless, and making the despair of foreign travellers in this country who are accustomed to good French sauces. The many English travellers going to the Paris Exhibition at this time will no doubt be struck with the difference between fine French cookery and the somewhat monotonous English cookery, and it may be worth while to ask what is the secret of the well-known success of French cookery. This secret is simply the "stock-pot," a preparation of concentrated meat juice enabling the cook to give to all dishes—soup, sauces and entrees—the fine meat-flavor which distinguishes refined cookery from coarse cookery. Many cooks, undoubtedly, know how to prepare stock, but in most cases the quality of such stock is too weak and insipid, and besides does not keep in anything like warm weather; whilst, on the contrary, Liebig Company's Extract of Meat, being the finest concentrated meat-juice (1 lb. extract equal to 40 lbs. best lean meat), keeps for any length of time, and in any temperature, and enables the cook to obtain the highest perfection in French cookery. The warm season coming on, this may be a useful hint to ladies and housekeepers.—Lady's Pictorial.

Round Shoulders.

A stooping figure and a halting gait, accompanied by the unavoidable weakness of lungs incidental to a narrow chest, may be entirely cured by a very simple and easily performed exercise of raising one's self upon the toes leisurely in a perpendicular position several times daily. To take this exercise properly one must take a perfectly upright position, with the heels together and the toes at an angle of forty-five degrees. Then drop the arms lifelessly by the sides, animating and raising the chest to its full capacity muscularly, the chin well drawn in, and the crown of the head feeling as if attached to a string suspended from the ceiling above. Slowly rise up on the balls of both feet to the greatest possible height, thereby exercising all the muscles of the legs and body; come again into a standing position without swaying the body backward out of the perfect line. Repeat this same exercise, first on one foot, then on the other. It is wonderful what a straightening out power this exercise has upon round shoulders and crooked backs, and one will be surprised to note how soon the lungs begin to show the effect of such expansive development.—The Family Doctor.

Three Dogs.

John Burns, of Ithaca, N. Y., has a bird dog worth owning. Mrs. Burns left her baby in its carriage on a slanting walk while she went into a store. The carriage started toward the gutter when the intelligent dog seized hold of the vehicle and saved it from tipping over.

Lewis Lynde, of Montour county, Pennsylvania, has a big mastiff that saved his house from destruction by fire. The family were absent, when a spark from the stove set the kitchen floor on fire. The dog managed to upset a pail partly filled with water, and so extinguished the blaze.

Henry Roberts lost one child two months old in the great Johnstown disaster. He had in his house a Newfoundland dog, which was near the child when the fatal flood struck the house. The dog seemingly realized the situation and caught the child and started to swim to land. The force of the waters washed the dog and child against the school house, where they were held until the water began to abate, and as soon as the animal could he swam to the hillside with the babe in his mouth and delivered the dead infant to some people who were there.

Had One.

"Have you any particular object in loafing around here?" asked the contractor of a new building of an idler who was in the way.

"Yes, sir," was the prompt reply.

"Well, what is it?"

The Emperor and the Shah exchanged formal visits, and a grand banquet was given in the evening in honor of the Shah.

A cablegram says Mr. Gladstone spoke on Friday at Ramsay, bareheaded, in a thunderstorm. Mr. Gladstone addressed a Liberal meeting at Weymouth on Saturday. He said the Liberal party was moving in the right direction and at a fair pace. He spoke in favor of limiting the length of a Parliament to four or five years. Referring to Ireland, he admitted that crime had decreased there and attributed the improvement to recent remedial measures, to the beneficial influence of Irish members of Parliament and the priests, and above all to the knowledge possessed by the Irish people that a large majority of the people of England sympathized with them. It remained for Englishmen to say whether they will do a further act of justice, which alone would give a true union of the various countries comprehended under the designation of Great Britain and Ireland.

night—
The party was out at nine—
There were traces of tears in her bright blue eyes
That looked mournfully up to mine.

For some one had said, she whispered to me,
With her face on her snowy bed,
Some one had said there were colors she wore
That they didn't like something—red.

So I took my little girl upon my knee—
I am old and exceedingly wise,
And I said, "My dear, now listen to me,
Just listen and I'll dry your eyes."

"This world is a difficult world, indeed,
And people are hard to suit,
And the man who plays on the violin
Is a bore to the man with the flute.

"And I myself have often thought
How very much better 'twould be
If every one of the folks that I know
Would only agree with me.

"But since they will not, the very best way
To make this world look bright
Is, never mind what people say,
But do what you think is right."

"IMMIGRANT CHILDREN."—Mr. John T. Middlemore, the founder of the Orphan Children's Emigration Charity, London, Ont., left Liverpool on the 31st ult in the S.S. Lake Winnipeg with a party of 30 girls and 50 boys between the ages of 8 and 18 years, who are brought out to this country for adoption or hire, chiefly among farmers. They are expected to arrive at the Guthrie Home, near the city, on or about the 15th inst. This will be Mr. Middlemore's 16th annual visit to these shores with juvenile emigrants from Birmingham, England, since 1872. Already many applications accompanied with good references have been made for the children expected to arrive, but more are required. Further particulars may be obtained by addressing Mr H. Gibbens, Manager of the Guthrie Home, London, Ont.

At the adjourned meeting held in the school room of section No. 4, Artemesia, on Saturday last, the following motion was carried: "That a new brick house be built, not to exceed in cost $2,500. Inspector Campbell on his last official visit condemned the present building as not being habitable.

Mr. Nat Burke had a fine barn built on Thursday last. Mr. F. Irish was the contractor.

Mr. David stinson's new house is progressing favorably, and when completed it will stand second to none in this vicinity.

Mr. Joseph Stinson, of Hill & Co's. store, Markdale, spent Sunday last with his parents here.

This section of the country seems to be over run with sheep and cattle buyers, and nearly everything in that line is bought up.

People who "like their neighbors as themselves" shouldn't, when their horses die, take the carcase and draw it in the vicinity of their neighbor's house. We think a little bit of British justice would not be misplaced in this case.

ADVICE TO MOTHER. Are your disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of Cutting Teeth? THE TRADE POLICY

The proposal of the government to open up extensive commercial relations between Australia, South America and the West Indies excites the ridicule of the free trade press and the presence in Ottawa of an Australian named Predham, whose views are as narrow as their own, gives occasion for further belittling of the movement. The average Grit is not happy unless he is deerying some public enterprise. The Halifax Chamber of Commerce has however, declared that the West Indies offers a promising field for a greatly extended trade. A trade with China and Japan via. the C P R is growing up and why not with Australia? Other countries more remote than we are trade largely with Australia, and why should the Government not make an offer to build up a profitable trade for British Columbia's fish and lumber? Our trade in agricultural implements and in other lines is growing with Australia as it is, under the trade policy of the Conservative party of Canada, and the outlook is very bright.

FLESHERTON, ONT., THURSDAY, JUNE 27, 1889. W. H. THURSTON, EDITOR & PROPRIETOR

ACROSS THE CONTINENT.

A Lady's Trip to the Golden State via C. P. R.

Vancouver—Experience With the — Customs — Beautiful Coast Scenery—Arrival at Portland.

Specially Written for The Advance.

Vancouver is the terminus of the C. P. R., situated on Burrard Inlet. The eastern end of the town extends along the Inlet in the flats, while the west end extends back from the water on elevated ground, with a gradual rise from the harbor. With the exception of the steep embankment in front of the station, the situation of the town is indeed picturesque. A fine view of Mt. Baker with its snow capped cone is had here, while just across the Inlet are the Vancouver Island mountains, with the Cascades to the north and Olmypics to the south west. In May, 1886, it was a dense forest. From May to July it grew rapidly, but a fire, spreading from the surrounding forests in July, destroyed every building but one, so that in three years this extensive town has sprung up, its population being nearly 6,000. The site wherein stands Mr. Pedley's house and church now, one year ago was forest. Now it is built up with fine private residences, many of which would do credit to towns older and larger. There were three new churches near completion in the west end of the town viz., Baptist, Methodist and Congregational, the two latter being fine edifices. Steamships leave regularly for Japan, San Francisco, Alaska and Victoria, also for the Puget Sound ports, Tacoma, Seattle and Pt. Townsend. Streets, public buildings, stores, etc., are lighted with gas and electric lights. We were both surprised and pleased at the whole apearance of the town, though largely settled by Canadians, yet the manner of life, and style of doing business is American. It being Good Friday when we arrived, and a holiday, the places of business were closed, and the town very quiet and orderly, but on Sunday many of the stores were open and business going on as usual. There is every appearance of it becoming a great town at no very distant day, with facilities for trade and commerce from Europe, as well as having the way opened up from the east by the C. P. R. I would just say here that no true Canadian, let him be Grit or Tory, could travel over this line from North Bay to Vancouver, but would give all honor to the man who first surveyed the line, and to the man who carried out the building of it in the face of almost insurmountable difficulties and barriers. One cannot help feeling a spirit of loyalty spring up within them as they ride along, for the man who had such unflinching determination and grit, (for he was a grit every time). Canadians should be proud of the road, and prouder of the founder of it, and all talk of expense and outlay will be put aside and forgotten once they have travelled over it. Apparently the natural pass was formed by the Great Creator for just this purpose, and then men raised up to carry it out.

On our arrival at Vancouver our party broke up, as they all remained here, for some time at least, with two exceptions besides ourselves. These were bound for Portland and Eugene cities respectively. We were the only ones going to the Golden State. After a pleasant four day's visit with our friends we repaired to the boat Monday afternoon, which left about 5 p.m. Here we were met by the entire party who had come down to see us off. The evening was delightful, so calm and placid were the waters; scarcely a ripple ruffled its surface. Steaming out of the harbor and down the Sound we stood until the town receded from sight, then we bade farewell to Canadian shores. Our boat is elegantly fitted up and everything is clean and comfortable. On entering the saloon we find a good deal of bustle going on around the purser's office; berths being secured for the night, so we go and do likewise. In about an hour all hands are called below to open trunks and baggage for examination before we arrive at any of the American ports. Over this we have no little amusement, as our trunks are well roped and we politely inform our examiner that he will have to unrope, and rope them up again if he wishes to see into them. At this he looks quite blank and tells us to get the baggage man to do it, he tells us to get the examiner and vice versa. We inform them that they must settle it between themselves, and when they are ready we will let them have the keys. Our friends appearing on the scene ask us if we have had it examined. We then inform them of what has been going on. The baggage man laughingly tells us that of course he would do it before he would let us do it, and consents to unrope one if our friends will do the other. This they consent to do and with a good deal of joking on both sides perform their task. This being over we are allowed to take our smaller pieces of baggage to our rooms which we do, and then go out to see what there is to be seen, and as it is not very striking and is getting somewhat dusky soon return to the saloon where we find a gentleman playing and singing, as we have a fine piano on board. We are entertained till near midnight with music. About 9 o'clock we call at Port Townsend to discharge cargo, but as it is dark we can see nothing of the town. This as well as Seattle and Tacoma are in Washington Territory. Next morning we arrive at Seattle about 7 o'clock where we stay about an hour loading and unloading cargo. Not knowing how long we were to remain we did not go ashore. The town from the harbor presents a fine appearance. Many fine buildings both private and public facing the water. The embankment rises from the water perpendicularly forty or fifty feet. The road way leading down to the harbor is very steep. Some of the gentlemen starting out to see the town returned saying it was too tiresome to climb. Those who persevered in climbing the hill told us it was handsomely built and full of business life. It has since been completely destroyed by fire in this portion of it.

Leaving here we arrrive at Tacoma about 10.30, where we are informed that we will not be able to make connections with the train for Portland city until 9.30 p.m. We therefore have time to see something of the town. The appearance from the harbor is something similar to that of Seattle. A high embankment rising in front of the station and wharf to about 100 feet. Here, if you are fond of climbing, you can ascend a flight of steps and get a fine view from the top of the cliff, all along which are fine private residences and handsomely laid out grounds. Trees, grass and flowers looking as though it was midsummer, and heat intense, feeling more like a day in July or August than April. The streets rise in terraces, having flights of steps leading from one to the other in the side walks. It is a beautiful city and has some handsome public buildings. Leaving the station, the first building to our left is the C. P. R. offices, being a fine massive structure of granite. Just before arriving here and a short distance from the station we come to where they are cutting down the embankment or rather washing it down by means of hydraulic water power. Here it was washed down and carried away with very little labor. The streets are thronged with people hurrying hither and thither or standing in groups, many of them having come to seek employment, but without avail. After going around the town until 3 o'clock, we went to the Tacoma House, which is the largest and best hotel in the place, and I do not think we have its equal in Ontario. It is a handsome building, covering almost an entire block, with fine grounds around it, very prettily situated on the bank of the river with no buildings near it, and handsomely and richly finished and furnished throughout. Having had a refreshing sleep and rest here, we felt better prepared to continue our journey to Portland by night, where we arrived next morning about 6 o'clock. This is the roughest piece of road we have travelled over yet. Here we have to remain until 4 p.m. On our alighting from the train we were almost deafened by bus drivers, hack men and express men, yelling at the top of their voices and all besieging us at the same time, so that it was almost impossible to tell what any of them was saying. We were glad indeed to get into a bus and get out of the din. Shortly after our arrival at the hotel we were disappointed to see the rain coming down, as it prevented us from seeing anything of the city, as it is the finest in the state of Oregon. However, there was nothing for us to do but take it easy, which we did by securing a room and again having a refreshing sleep until dinner time.

Eugenia

From our own Correspondent.

We are glad to learn that Mr. Jared, who had his collar bone broken about two weeks ago by being pulled out of the buggy by a colt he was leading, has almost recovered.

Mr. John Williams, sr., has erected the frame of his new dwelling house.

The Eugenia Union Sunday School held their annual picnic and concert on the picnic ground near the falls, on Tuesday last, June 25. A very pleasant time was enjoyed.

I understand Mr. Henry Cairns has let the contract for the erection of a new frame barn, and the work will be proceeded with immediately.

Mrs. Rontwait, of Floss township, is visiting friends around Eugenia.

Mr. Rob't Williams has returned from Gravenhurst.

Service will be conducted in the Methodist Church every alternate Sabbath at 2.30 p.m., and each alternate Sabbath at 6.30 p.m. This arrangement has become necessary owing to a change in the circuit.

As Mr. Andrew Sample was passing through the 10th con., on Saturday morning, a large black bear crossed the road a short distance before him. As Mr. Sample was on horse back bruin showed no inclination to attack him. A short time before he was seen in Mr. Turner's field chasing the sheep but was frightened away before he got any mutton.

The Methodist Church and grounds are now enclosed by a neat and substantial picket fence.

The Orange Hall has been whitened and the wood work is to be painted. The outside is also receiving a coat of red paint so that when finished it will present quite an attractive appearance.

Mr. Thos. Crow raised the frame of his new house on Saturday.

The teacher and pupils of Hillside Academy had a pic-nic to the falls last Friday. Notwithstanding the rain they seemed to enjoy themselves thoroughly.

Mr. E. Philips, of the Toronto police force, and a number of friends were in the village last Saturday.

THE IRISH CATASTROPHE.

Details of the Shocking Railway Disaster in Armagh.

WHOLE FAMILIES KILLED.

A Dublin despatch says: Further despatches from Armagh show that the accident was far more serious than at first reported. Seventy bodies have been taken from the wreck. There are others buried under the debris. Warrenpoint, the place where the party was bound, is a watering place at the mouth of the Newry River, in County Down. Over a hundred of the passengers were injured.

The following particulars have been received: The excursion party left Armagh yesterday morning in two trains. The accident occurred at a point where the trains had to ascend a grade on a bank fifty feet high. The first train ascended the grade without trouble. The second section attempted to run the ascent, but the weight of the train proved too great for the engine. Several cars were detached and allowed to run back towards the level track, but before they reached it they came in collision with an ordinary train from Armagh proceeding at a good rate of speed. The excursion cars were completely wrecked. The scene which ensued was heartrending. Hosts of volunteers were soon at hand, and the dead and wounded were taken from the wreck and carried down the bank. Medical aid was called for, and a special train from Belfast brought to the scene twenty surgeons from that city and a number of medical men from other places between Belfast and Armagh. The disaster is unparalleled in the railroad history of Ireland. The accident has cast a gloom over Armagh. All the shops were closed this afternoon and the people are in general mourning. The engineer, fireman and guard of the train, and the traffic manager's clerk were summoned before a magistrate and were remanded on a charge of being responsible for the accident.

DETAILS OF THE DISASTER.

The break-power of the engine of the third train was inadequate. While the second train was ascending the incline the engineer remarked to the fireman, "I am afraid we can't do it." The following train was commencing the ascent when the engineer saw the runaway cars. Shutting off steam and reversing the lever the engineer and fireman jumped from the engine, shouting to the passengers to do likewise. The latter, however, not hearing the cries did not obey. No one was injured on that train. The engine was hurled 60 feet down an embankment. The carriage that ran into the engine was shattered to splinters, and fragments of dress, umbrellas, etc., were scattered hundreds of yards. A dozen corpses were found beneath the engine in a parboiled condition. Some of the occupants of the runaway cars tried to escape, but the doors were locked. The first part of the train started back in pursuit of the runaway cars, and the passengers saw the collision at a distance of 300 yards.

ANOTHER ACCOUNT.

Another account says the engineer of the second train, finding his engine powerless to pull the train up the steep grade, unlinked several cars with the object of taking the front portion of the train to the next station and returning for the remainder. Heavy stones were placed behind the wheels of the detached cars to prevent them from slipping, but the locomotive on restarting gave the entire train a shunt that displaced the stones. The detached cars began to slip down the grade, their speed gradually increasing until they attained a frightful velocity. After running four miles, they crashed with terrible force into the third train about a mile and a half from Armagh.

BITTER LAMENTATIONS.

The shrieks of the children were horrible. The bodies of the victims were arranged in rows as soon as recovered. Many were mangled beyond recognition. There is scarcely a family in Armagh that has not some one dead. The embankment on which the accident occurred is 70 feet high. Many touching scenes were witnessed. The children bore their injuries with great patience. Wrecking gangs are at work clearing away the debris. A private of the Irish Fusiliers before the collision jumped on the foot plate of one of the cars and dropped four children to the ground. He then offered to assist others to escape, but his offer was refused. In many cases whole families were killed. Crowds are visiting the scene and the air is rent with lamentations.

DIED OF FRIGHT.

A car driver named Hughes, who visited the scene of the disaster, was so horrified at the sight that he died on the spot. His corpse was taken to Armagh in his own car.

A Boy Who Made His Mark.

A Kansas City, Mo., despatch says: Monday afternoon Frank Leopold, aged 12 years, and Katie Malden, aged 11 years, visited Robbins' circus. After the show they started to walk to Centropolis, their home. When within a mile of the place a man named Sieddons jumped from the bushes and attempted to assault the little girl. The boy attacked Sieddons with a pocket knife and slashed him across the face in a fearful manner nearly cutting out an eye and cutting off part of his nose. Sieddons fled, but was afterwards captured.

LORD CECIL'S DROWNING.

Romantic History of a Soldier, Preacher and Nobleman.

Further particulars concerning the drowning of Lord Cecil has reached the Times. He was going from Belleville in a boat in company with Mr. Churchill, with a load of stores and camping material, and when off Pool's Point, a short distance from Adolphustown wharf, he rose up in the boat to adjust the sail, when losing his hold he fell headlong into the water, coming up at some distance. He swam around for a few minutes and then sank before the boat could be got around to where he was. He was going to hold a series of meetings in the Town Hall at Adolphustown. He was thought to be a good swimmer, and at first it was thought he might reach shore safely, or at least keep afloat until he was rescued. Mr. Poole, who witnessed the accident from the shore, shouted to him to keep up courage and he would be rescued all right. He answered back "No!" and immediately went under. His body was recovered yesterday afternoon.

SKETCH OF HIS LIFE.

Lord Cecil was born July 18th, 1841, and joined the First Rifle Brigade in England when 17 years of age. He was a wild, reckless youth, full of dash and pride, an inveterate gambler and horseman, and one, as he stated in a sermon at Brockville, "who had committed every sin in the decalogue." He served as lieutenant in the Rifle Brigade, and with it came to Canada, to be stationed in turn in Kingston, Hamilton and Quebec. In 1868 he left the brigade because he was prohibited from promulgating the religious doctrine he professed among the men. The matter was fought to the bitter end, and it was not until the Duke of Cambridge issued a mandate that the conflict ceased. Then Lord Cecil tendered his resignation, and since that date devoted his time, talents and fortune to the propagation of the doctrine of the Brethren, to whom he bore the relationship of chief brother. To-day his followers are scattered in all lands. They are known as Cecilites or Plymouth Brethren, but these titles are not recognized by those who have close relationship in the work. Lately he spent most of his summers in the neighborhood of Kingston, camping and evangelizing.

HIS CONVERSION.

"Lord Cecil told me," said a lady to-day, "about his conversion. He was in Hamilton in 1867 or 1868, when he was called home on the demise of his father. His mother, the Marchioness of Exeter, a godly woman, and his sister, the wife of Viscount Sandon, another pious lady, both appealed to him to forsake his wild career. Little good resulted, but on his return to Hamilton early religious impressions, which had been made by a devoted governess who frequently talked to him in childhood about Jesus, came swelling upon his soul, and a marvellous conversion occurred. He told me he was out with the soldiers on the march, and while the most lively music was being played he was stricken with the enormity of his sins. Then and there with timidity he asked to be pardoned and God gave him peace. He frequently told me he could go to the very spot in Hamilton where the glorious change was wrought.

HIS CHARACTER.

Lord Cecil was of a most gentle and lovable disposition. He was retiring and most unpretending. He was devoted to God and His work. He was remarkably gifted. His knowledge of the Scriptures was something wonderful. He was eloquent and yet simple. His language was grand and lofty, and his bearing most gentle and winning. "Frequently he held his co-religionists spell-bound as he unfolded to them the deep things of God," said a Plymouthite. "He was what would be termed in any other Church a big gun." He spent his winters in the Southern States.

HIS ANCESTRY.

He was not given to telling of his family history. His ancestry was ever kept in the background. Once he was asked as to his relationship with the Marquis of Salisbury, the present Premier of England, and as the question was pointed, and as it was said he was his brother, he stated as follows: "William Cecil was an eminent statesman of Lincolnshire, born in 1520, and son of Richard Cryssel, an officer of the court in attendance upon Henry VIII., and who was raised to the baronetcy of Burghley in 1571, in Queen Elizabeth's reign. This statesman married in 1561 Mary, sister of Sir John Cheke, tutor to Edward VI., to whom was born Thomas Cecil, successor to Baron Burghley. The first wife dying, the Baron was married again to Mildred, daughter of Sir Anthony Coke, of Giddy Hall, Essex. By her Robert Cecil was born, afterwards created Earl of Salisbury, and from whom the present Earl is descended. Lord Cecil is a descendant of the heir to the baronetcy. Two families sprang from the same parent. This constitutes the relationship."

HIS RELATIVES.

Lord Cecil was 48 years of age. He intended returning to England this fall on a visit to his relatives. He was not on remarkably good terms with the present Marquis of Exeter. Some years ago, when the son of the Marquis became of age, great fetes were being enjoyed at the baronial castle. Lord Disraeli was in attendance. Lord Cecil attended, and, in the midst of the gayety, he arose in the park and preached the Gospel to those assembled. His action greatly offended his brother. However, in after years they became reconciled, but Lord Cecil never visited him because he was "a servant of the flesh."

KNOWN IN HAMILTON.

Lord Cecil was well known in Hamilton. It will be remembered by many of the older inhabitants that he came out with the Rifle Brigade and was stationed here for some time. Subsequently he visited Hamilton frequently in connection with services held by the Plymouth Brethren. He was held in the highest estimation.

Wm. Roberts, M. D., Physician to the Manchester, Eng., Infirmary and Lunatic Hospital, Professor of Medicine in Owen's College, says: "Gradual failure of strength, increased pallor or sallowness, and disinclination for exercise is one of the prominent symptoms of kidney disease." Warner's Safe Cure is the only remedy that is guaranteed to cure kidney disease.

NEWS FROM STANLEY.

Puzzling Despatches Received from the Great White Explorer.

A London special cable from Zanzibar last (Wednesday) night says: A letter has been received here from Ururi South, southeast of Victoria Nyanza, dated 2nd of December. It states that Stanley arrived at Ururi, stayed for a short time, returned to Victoria Nyanza, left behind 56 men, owing to sickness, and 46 rifles. Most of the sick eventually died. A short time after Mitchell arrived there and took away the rifles. Shortly after it was reported that H. M. Stanley sustained a heavy loss of men owing to sickness and want of provisions. Finally Stanley arrived. He said Emin Pacha is at Unyara, fifteen days distant. Stanley took away everything and returned to Emin Pacha, giving the writer a letter to take personally to the Agent-General.

Sir Francis de Winton, who is a great authority on African exploration, writes: "The telegram just received via Zanzibar gives news of Stanley up to 2nd December last. He was then at Ururi, at the southeast end of Lake Victoria Nyanza, having left Emin at Unyara, which is situated in the district of Kavirondo, at the northeast corner of the lake. It should be remembered that Stanley left his camp at Bonalya, on the Aruwimi, on the 4th of September, 1888, and as it would appear an impossiblity for the journey from Bonalya to Ururi to be accomplished in 82 days, i.e., from the 4th of September to the 2nd of December, some mistake has been made as regards this date. It is quite possible for the messenger who brought the news to have left Ururi in the middle of February and reached Zanzibar on the 10th of June. The allusion to Mitchell is also somewhat puzzling. At present the white men with Stanley are Lieut. Stairs, Nelson, Mountenay, Jeppson, Dr. Parkes and Bonny. Besides Stanley's servant the only other white men in that part of Africa are Emin Pacha and Captain Casati. Nelson might, however, become Mitchell in passing into the native vernacular and then back again into English. From the direction Stanley is taking it would appear he is making for Msalala, at the south end of the lake, where a large depot of provisions was deposited more than a year ago, and as he would have the advantage of water carriage to take his caravan from Unyara to Kagheyi missionary station, at the south end of the lake, it is to be hoped he has for some time been in possession of his stores, so that the main difficulties of his enterprise have been successfully overcome. Should my surmise that he arrived at Ururi about the 2nd February, in place of the 2nd December, be correct, and that he has since pushed on to Kagheyi, at the south end of the lake, we may soon have further news in addition to the letter given to the trader of Ururi, who forwards this message and who is bringing the letter himself to Zanzibar."

A LEAP FOR DEATH.

Buffalo Lady Suicides at the Falls—Her Body Recovered.

A ast (Friday) night's Niagara Falls, Ont., despatch says: About half-past 8 o'clock this afternoon a well-dressed lady walked deliberately out on the raceway near the river gate at Prospect Park, immediately above the American falls, and holding her arms over her head leaped into the rushing water, that took but a few seconds to sweep her over the American falls. Several gentlemen near by saw her make the leap, and rushed down to see the unfortunate woman pass over the brink of the falls. They notified the Park Superintendent, who procured assistance and made a search for the body in the river below the falls. It was discovered about half an hour afterwards in the river near the Canadian side by Aaron Glassbrook, who towed the body to the shore, and had it taken to Undertaker Morse's rooms at Drummondville and taken charge of by the coroner. The description of the suicide is as follows: Large, dark-complexioned woman, about 45 years of age, weighing about 170 pounds, large features. All the clothing excepting a pair of black corsets and dark stockings and shoes had been stripped off the body. The woman came from Buffalo on the 3.10 train this afternoon and went direct to the park and took her life. A lady who saw the woman jump off into the river fainted and had to be carried to her hotel. At the place where the woman leaped into the river was found a black silk parasol with light wood handle, a white handkerchief, a lady's wrap of black material, embroidered with black silk, a small, thin glass and a half-pint empty flask that had recently contained whiskey.

ONE YEAR IN JAIL.

Dr. J. C. Bright, of Chatham, Convicted and Sentenced.

A despatch from Chatham says: At the General Sessions yesterday the trial of Dr. J. C. Bright for furnishing a noxious drug to Clara Douglas, alias Wrightman, to procure an abortion, excited much interest. The prisoner and his counsel, Mr. Christie, were confident of an acquittal, and a Pinkerton detective brought out all the facts derogatory to the girl's character. A strong defence was made and the case was given to the jury at 10.45 p.m. In ten minutes they brought in a verdict of guilty, and Bright was remanded to jail awaiting sentence. This morning he was brought up and sentenced to one year in the common jail.

It Appealed to All.

An Iowa farmer, who believed in having two strings to his bow, put up in his garden this sign:

BOYS, DON'T TOUCH THESE MELONS, FOR THEY ARE GREEN AND GOD SEES YOU.

A family of four children and the father and mother, named DesChamps, in a small cottage this side of St. Louis toll-gate, Quebec, were all poisoned on Wednesday by drinking some cream in their coffee which was skimmed off milk that contained turpentine that leaked out of a paint pot directly over a bowl of milk during the night. Dr. Falardeau was immediately sent for, and on his arrival administered an emetic. The family are doing as well as could be expected.

THE MAYBRICK MURDER.

Evidence Taken as to the Wife's Guilt—She is Committed for Trial.

A cablegram from London, dated last (Wednesday) night says: The nine hours' sitting to-day of the county justices before whom Mrs. Maybrick made her first appearance in public on a charge of having put her late husband to death by arsenical poisoning, has served to exhaust only half the evidence in the long chain of facts. The excitement around the new County Sessions House, where the magisterial investigation was opened this morning and will be continued to-morrow, has been strung to the highest pitch. The jury's gallery was occupied with fashionably-dressed ladies, whilst the public gallery contained a mixed audience of the respectable class. Supt. Bryning conducts the case for the prosecution, and the prisoner has the advantage as counsel of Mr. Pickford, who is a leading junior at the bar in this city.

Mr. A. Brierley, cotton broker, whose intimacy with the wife of the deceased gentleman has brought him into unpleasant prominence, was not represented by counsel, as before the coroner, nor did he put in an appearance. One other much interested person, however, has retained counsel. Mr. Edgecome appeared on behalf of Baroness Von Roque, the mother of the accused lady.

The court was hushed when in response to the command of Supt. Bryning Mrs. Maybrick was brought into the dock from below. She approached the dock rails with a firm step and head erect. She is a slightly-built person of medium height, and, according to popular report, is good-looking, having light golden hair. She was shrouded from head to foot in heavy black crape. Nothing but the chain of the prisoner was visible to the court. Her widow's veil, which she never once lifted, completely hid the upper part of her face. A comfortable-looking arm chair was provided, and into this she settled down, her head reclining upon the upholstery, while Supt. Bryning unfolded in a succinct, concise and unbiased way the whole series of startling facts already disclosed before the coroner. The cross-examination of witnesses was directed to show that the deceased took nerve tonics containing arsenic, but the only new fact elicited was that Brierley paid a London hotel bill of £2 13s 6d. The court adjourned till to-morrow.

A last (Thursday) night's Liverpool cable says: The police proceedings in the Maybrick case were concluded this evening, with the result that the accused lady has to stand her trial before an assize jury.

Mrs. Maybrick was brought into the dock at 10 this morning. The public part of the court was crowded with well-dressed people. Mrs. Maybrick resumed her former position in an arm chair, provided for her convenience, and she sat through the weary hours of examination and cross-examination with a rigidity that surprised everybody.

A few minutes after the hearing was resumed she scribbled a pencil note to Mr. Cleaver, her solicitor, and this she repeated several times during the day. Her face was still enveloped in an impenetrable crape veil.

The charwoman who cleaned Mr. Maybrick's office was the first witness of the day, she being followed by an office boy. Their evidence had reference to luncheons of beef tea prepared by the accused lady, and from which Mr. Maybrick suffered ill-effects.

Mr. Michael Maybrick was the next witness, and stated that Florence Elizabeth Maybrick was from 27 to 30 years of age, and her late husband died in his 50th year. Witness was summoned to Battle Crease by peremptory telegrams from his brother Edwin and Mrs. Briggs, the friend of the Maybricks, three days before the deceased gentleman died. He related how he was led to suspect Mrs. Maybrick was tampering with her husband's medicines and food; the measures he took to secure proper and reliable nursing, and the treatment, more especially after his suspicions had been intensified by receiving from the children's nurse Yapp a remarkable letter from Mrs. Maybrick to Mr. A. Brierley, her lover, and how he found certain incriminatory packages and deadly phials in the room used by Mrs. Maybrick. Other witnesses were the chemists from whom Mrs. Maybrick had bought fly papers similar to those found in the solution in her wash basin.

The chemist's assistant who made up two bottles of medicine for Mr. Maybrick from a prescription by Dr. Fuller, of London, a physician whom the deceased gentleman consulted at the end of April, said the ingredients of which they were compounded were free from arsenic.

Nurses Gore, Gallery and Wilson related bedside episodes, including the suspicious handling of their patient's medicines and food by Mrs. Maybrick. The last named repeated an exclamation made three times by Mr. Maybrick to his wife the night before he died: "Oh, Florrie, how could you do it? I did not think it of you," and the wife's rejoinder, "You silly old darling, don't bother your head about anything." Mrs. Maybrick, turning to Nurse Wilson, added, "I cannot tell what is the matter with him or what has brought his illness on."

In cross-examination, Nurse Gore said that when she took charge of the patient the medicine bottles were kept in the lavatory, but she had them brought into the bedroom, but not beside the table. Mr. Maybrick was not strong enough then to leave his bed without assistance.

Mr. Edward Davies, analyst, produced a host of ominous-looking phials, jars and packages, which were a portion of some scores of them handed to him by the police for analysis. There were many articles brought from Battle Crease in which he had found traces of arsenic. He also found traces of arsenic in a portion of the viscera of the deceased. He admitted in cross-examination that these traces were small in quantity, and that the largest amount found in the liver was exactly half of the least quantity the witness had found previously in any fatal case.

Superintendent Bryning next gave the final evidence, and this concluded the case for the prosecution.

Counsel for the pisoner asked the bench if there was a case to go before a jury, and the magistrates said they were agreed that there was. Thereupon he intimated that he should reserve the prisoner's defence.

Mrs. Maybrick was asked to stand whilst the usual caution before committal was read by the presiding Magistrate, and she stood forward without evincing the slightest nervous tremor. She was then formally committed, and at a few minutes to 7 o'clock she was removed from the dock and subsequently conveyed to Walton jail, where she will await her trial at the next Liverpool assizes, which open on July 26th.

THE NAUGHTY PICTURES.

Winnipeg "Sassity" Shocked by Alleged Immoral Pictorial Advertisements.

A last (Thursday) night's Winnipeg despatch says: A case in the Police Court yesterday attracted great attention. Burden, the city bill poster, was arraigned on a charge of a violation of the city by-law by posting lithographs of an indecent character for Lily Clay's Female Burlesque Company. There was a large attendance of spectators, and the defendant was represented by able counsel. The Chief of Police, several city clergymen, and leading Christians gave evidence for the prosecution, and were severely cross-examined by the lawyer on the opposing side, who had gathered from cigarette and quack medicine advertisements, illustrated papers, statuary, etc., all the suggestive advertisements he could find, with the view of eliciting an expression of opinion from the witnesses as to their indecency. The result was rather ludicrous. The following is a sample of the examination: Archdeacon Fortin was shown one of the pictures complained of, and asked his opinion of its character. Answer, "I look upon that picture as grossly immoral to begin with, because it represents certain portions of the body which decency dictates should be covered in proper society; secondly, because the women represented are attired in the garb of harlots, endeavoring to seduce by their blandishments; thirdly, because I would be afraid to let my little children look at pictures like that; fourth, because I think such pictures will have a demoralizing effect on many members, particularly the young members of my flock.

Cross-examined—When oarsmen row on the river are they in the garb of proper society?

Yes.

Is a person attired for bathing properly attired?

Yes.

To the rev. gentleman was submitted a picture in the Graphic. He thought it much less nude than the pictures complained of. In these pictures a part of the body which should be covered was represented. He regarded a picture from pen and pencil shown him as immoral. He did not think Venus de Medici was immoral, because it was a work of art. These pictures were very far removed from works of art. He thought exhibit "B," a common drug store advertisement, equally objectionable. The druggists' lithograph, representing Humphrey's homœopathic specifics, was in his opinion also very objectionable. Other exhibits representing advertisements for cigar stores were produced. He thought them highly objectionable. He did not consider the Laocoon indecent, because it was a work of art and because such representations were in such places that they were witnessed only by educated people who would not extract evil from them.

The counsel then produced Alphonse Daudets' Sappho, a book, which, he said, he had purchased at the bookstore of Richardson, who is a respectable man and a member of a city church. The work was produced and the illustrations from it were submitted to Rev. Mr. Fortin. Some of them he saw no objection to, another one was a little off color. The pictures from the "Ladies' Pictorial," an English publication, were also submitted. They seemed to Rev. Mr. Fortin to be all right. He had seen ladies in full dress at parties, and he had seen much that he considered out of place. He had endeavored to correct evils of that kind by private influence and public exhortation. He did not think the nude statue of Venus should be suppressed. This inquiry went on and witnesses on both sides of the case heard, when the case was adjourned till Saturday.

A CARDINAL'S RANK.

A Quebec Paper Discusses How Cardinals are Treated in Canada and by British Royalty Respectively.

A Quebec despatch says: L'Electeur has undertaken to reply to some statements made at the anti-Jesuit Convention in Toronto, and starts by taking up the claim of one of the speakers that Cardinal Taschereau had been given a seat on the throne on the opening of the Legislature alongside the Lieutenant-Governor. This, it says, is untrue. The Cardinal, as a prince of the Church, was entitled to rank as an Ambassador does at court, and he was given a seat on the floor of the House to the left of the throne, but not on it. This, it says, was pure courtesy, which would have been extended to His Eminence in any civilized country As an instance of the consideration in which Cardinal Manning is held at the English court, it says that when His Eminence appears he does so in his full red and ermine and he takes the rank of a Prince. The journal says that when he once called at one of the royal palaces to visit the Queen by invitation, he was received by the Prince of Wales, who personally conducted him to Her Majesty, with whom he held a long conversation. His reception altogether was of the most affable nature.

Potash in Corn Cobs.

There is a good deal of potash in corn cobs, as thrifty housewives long ago learned when making soap. It is here that a good deal of the mineral elements of the corn plant are concentrated. Perhaps it is for the potash as a corrective of acidity in the stomach that animals will often eat the cob. It is all the better for being charred or burned. Burn to a crisp the corn cobs from which fattening hogs have devoured the corn, and see how greedily the same animals will eat them.—New York Mail and Express.

"Old Tecumseh" Sherman is authority for the statement that every year the girls at West Point get prettier, and that such has been the case for 50 years.

The Ven. Churchill Julius, Archdeacon of Ballarat, once a famous Oxford athlete and a hardworking Liverpool clergyman, recently caught a ruffian beating his wife. He seized the brute, overpowered him after a struggle, and personally marched him off to the look-up.

CURRENT TOPICS.

MRS. MATILDA SKELLY, of Millersburg, Pa., applied for a pension some years ago but the case hung fire so long that she sought other means of support, and some two or three weeks ago remarried. Just eight days after her marriage she received a letter granting the pension, with $5,375 arrears. Owing to her marriage the valuable paper had to be returned to Washington.

THIS is a large world and there is room enough for all, remarks the New York Herald, while discussing speculations as to the future of the race. Thinking does no harm if only it is really thinking. It is not the Day of Judgment of which we need to be afraid, but the days of no judgment. Stick to your common sense, don't go up in a balloon, avoid being a crank, and within those limits entertain what opinions you please.

THE Compulsory Education Law passed by the Illinois Legislature compels children between the ages of 7 and 14 to attend school at least sixteen weeks each year. Parents are liable to fine for not seeing that the law is obeyed. Attendance is allowed upon private schools teaching reading, writing, arithmetic and United States history, if approved by the Board of Education. The appointment of truant officer is provided for.

IT will be remembered that Lord Dudley and other noblemen were recently arrested for gambling at the Field Club in London. They were discharged by the Police Magistrate who laid down the obiter dictum that "it would be absurd to fine gentlemen of wealth and position, such a sum as six shillings and eightpence." Since that two boys caught playing "pitch and toss" have been fined each seven shillings and sixpence with seven days' imprisonment at hard labor.

A PHILADELPHIA soap man, who himself made a fortune on clear advertising, once told the writer of this paragraph that it would pay half a dozen papers of big circulation to take up any pauper from the street, establish him in any business under the sun, it didn't matter what, and give him a column of advertising free every day for a year. Then, he said, those papers would show by a practical object lesson to advertisers the tremendous effect of advertising, because the pauper they took off the streets would by that time be a millionaire.

THE Shah of Persia will reach Buckingham Palace from Brussels on July 1st. He will cross the channel on one of the Royal English yachts. He will be met at Charing Cross by the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Cambridge and other big guns. During his stay in Great Britain he will visit Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester, Glasgow, Edinburgh, Newcastle and York. He will be entertained at Invercauld by Sir Algernon Borthwick some time in July, and will examine Scottish life and scenery under the direction of his host, Sir Drummond Wolff.

THE English clergy seem to have a leaning toward large families and small incomes. Among the cases of distress lately reported to the Clergy Corporation are these: "A curate with eight children under eight years of age, and a stipend of £126 a year; a vicar with five young children, and and an annual income of £100; a vicar with six children under 15 years of age, and an annual income of £134 and a house; a vicar with eight children under 18 years of age, and £117 annual income; a curate with six young children, and a stipend of £120; a vicar with eleven children under 15 years of age, and an annual income of £189."

MR. EDISON is reported, in a conversation with a reporter who solicited his ideas on the subject of the projected world's fair in New York city, as saying that he would take an acre of space in such a fair and completely cover it with his inventions, of which he has no less that seventy now under way. "One of the most peculiar, and now promising good results," said Mr. Edison, "is what I may call a far-sight machine." By means of this extraordinary invention, the Electrical Review says, he hopes to be able to increase the range of vision by hundreds of miles, so that, for instance, "a man in New York could see the features of his friend in Boston with as much ease as he could see a performance on the stage. That," he added, "would be an invention worthy a prominent place in the world's fair, and I hope to have it perfected long before 1892."

PROFESSOR BRYCE, who has been writing so brilliantly on American institutions, is regius professor of civil law at Oxford, fellow and member of the governing body of Oriel College, a barrister-at-law, now, at least up till recently, one of the lecturers at the inns of court, and M. P. for South Aberdeen. His multifarious duties and appointments have necessitated the appointment by the university of a reader in Roman law to lecture on the subject he is supposed to teach. The professor does, of course, deliver the statutable number of lectures in Oxford, the hours he selects being late on Saturday afternoons and early on Monday mornings. It is needless to add that he is an advanced Reformer, but it is necessary to remind people that the Aberdeen member, the London barrister and the Oxford professor are one and the same person. He is a native of the granite city.

AN electric motor adapted to propelling vehicles upon streets is said to have been successfully invented at Indianapolis. It has long been the belief of many who have given the subject consideration that some method would soon be in use for propelling pleasure carriages along the streets and boulevards by mechanical means in lieu of horses, and numerous efforts have been made in that direction. We published some time ago an illustration of a carriage moved by steam generated by a small supply of naphtha or similar liquid carried under the seat, but this device, which appears to be used with some success in Germany is evidently open, in some degree at least, to the objections of danger and noise. A cart propelled by electricity has been operated in London, but it does not seem to have been a success owing both to the insufficiency of the battery power and the liability of derangement. The Indianapolis inventor claims that he can furnish a vehicle with electric motive power sufficient to run twenty-four hours without recharging and so arranged that the speed can be graduated as desired. Electricity has accomplished such wonders of late that it is easy to believe that it will be harnessed up for the service of man so as to safely and noiselessly propel his pleasure vehicles along the streets and highways.

ENTERTAINING the Shah means something, as with him are to be entertained his doctor, seven generals (aides de camp), seven chamberlains and three members of his Cabinet, not to speak of fourteen domestic servants, cooks, bearers, etc., all of whom must be looked after as the royal Persian's suite.

M'ME D'ORIAN, a Russian princess, died in Philadelphia last week, and, at her request, her entire wardrobe was packed in large trunks and sent to Johnstown. There were finely-woven silk hose, French-heeled slippers, silk underwear, silk, satin and plush costumes, and fine women's wear of all descriptions. This noble young woman's heart was undoubtedly in the right place, but the articles will not be handed out by the distributing committee for some time yet.

THE statistical person of the New York Sun says that the number of qualified voters in the city of New York now exceeds 300,000, which is more than the total vote cast at the last Presidential election in either Alabama, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Mississippi, Nebraska, Nevada, North Carolina, Oregon, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Vermont or West Virginia.

A PROCESS for electric deposition on glass or porcelain is ascribed to M. Hansen, and the medium used is a solution of chloride of gold, or of platinum in sulphuric ether, which has received a sufficient quantity of sulphur dissolved in a heavy oil, to bring the whole, after being gently boiled, to a consistency which permits it to be painted on the glass, etc., with a brush. The plate is then slowly heated in a furnace until the sulphur and chlorine are driven off, leaving the gold or platinum adhering to the surface.

A WEEK'S work in the cotton mills of England is 56 hours; in the mills of Massachusetts, 60 hours; in France, 72 hours; in Germany, from 66 to 72 hours; in the woolen mills in Germany, 76 hours; in France, 72 hours; in Massachusetts, 60; in Great Britain, 56; in Huddersfield and Densburg, 54. The productive capacity of one operative in the United States, Great Britain and Germany, taking 100 as the unit, is: In the United States, 100 in cotton, wool and silk; in Great Britain, 67 in cotton, 77 in wool, 81½ in silk; in Germany, 27½ in cotton, 60 in wool, 68 in silk.

An ingenious contrivance is about to be brought out by Captain Woolward, of the Royal mail steamer Don, by which it is proposed to do away with oars as a means of propelling ships' lifeboats. It consists of a hand-power screw propeller, which enables the boat to be driven by any one in it, though unacquainted with rowing. This, Captain Woolward points out, will obviate the chance of passengers who may get away from a stranded ship finding themselves in a boat without oars or having them without any one skilled in their use. The machinery takes up little room, and seems to be both efficient and simple.

IT is said that the largest and costliest private mansion in the world is that belonging to Lord Bute, called "Montstuart" and situated near Rothesay, Scotland. It covers nearly two acres, and is built in gothic style; the walls, turrets and balconies are built of stone. The immense tower in the centre of the building is 120 feet high, with a balcony around the top. The halls are constructed entirely of marble and alabaster; all the rooms are finished in mahogany, rosewood and walnut; the fireplaces are all carved marbles of antique designs. The exact cost of this fairy palace is not known, but it has never been estimated at less than $8,000,000. The immense mansion is one of the sights to be witnessed by those who enter the Clyde on the Glasgow steamers by daylight.

IN a most interesting medical libel suit of Dr. Tibbetts against Messrs. Macmillan, the publishers, tried before Mr. Justice Denman recently, Dr. Lauder Brunton showed how ill-founded are some popular notions about the functions of our organs. From time immemorial the spleen has been considered as the source of bad temper; and the learned Dr. Johnston, in his dictionary, gives the weight of his authority to this view, for he defines the spleen as the seat of anger and melancholy. Dr. Lauder Brunton stated that he had observed that animals which had been deprived of their spleens for purposes of experimentation were universally bad-tempered, though otherwise apparently well, and thought that therefore the spleen was, contrary to the general received ideas, the seat not of bad but of good temper.

THE Popular Science News recently offered a reward for the most correct answers to certain stated scientific problems. Among others was the old "conundrum," Which weighs the most, a pound of feathers or a pound of lead? Of course, a pound is a pound, no matter of what substance, and when the simple or thoughtless person answers that a pound of lead is the heaviest, everybody laughs. Mr. Charles Pitt, in answering this question, claims that the pound of lead would weigh the heaviest because the feathers would be buoyed up by a weight equal to that of the amount of air they displace—just as a cork is buoyed up in the water. In future, therefore, we must refrain from laughing at the fool's answer, as practically it is correct. Of course, if weighed in a vacuum a pound of any two substances would weigh alike.

TWENTY English literary women dined recently in London, and appeared to have had a very cheerful time, enjoying themselves and asserting the right of the weaker sex to have small sprees of its own. The only men present were the waiters, who were kept very busy. The menu was substantial, and cigarettes followed coffee, just like a regular man's debauch. Mrs. Mona Caird was in the chair, and talked, of course, about marriage, taking the ground that that institution is not a contract in the legal sense of the word, but, on the contrary, a sort of go-as-you-please journey through life, liable to sudden interruption when one or the other feels inclined to leave the track. Dinner was late, and one bell, which indicated that a waiter was wanted from outside, was going industriously until after 11 o'clock, and, in all respects, this first attempt of the sort in London was a success. Dresses were remarkably plain, most of the women running to simple blouses. Champagne was the only wine drunk.

MANY New York ladies are lending their aid in the formation of working women's clubs. A woman of leisure or wealth, or both, gathers about her a number of working girls to talk over the organization of a club. If the girls favor the idea they and the leader each invite friends to join with them, and a club is formed. One evening in the week is a social evening; the others are divided, as the members decide, into classes for cooking—always one of the most popular classes—dress making, plain sewing, reading, writing, arithmetic and physical culture. The programme varies according to the decision and finance of the club. The club devotes one evening to practical talks. On this evening health, management of money, duties of women, dress and the thousand other subjects that grow out of living in a world where conditions are constantly changing are discussed. All take part in the talks that follow the little lecture, and the subjects are usually chosen or suggested by the working members.

AT a recent meeting of the Royal Scottish Society of Arts, Mr. A. D. Mackenzie read an epitome of a paper prepared by him on the "Risk of Fire from Steam and Hot-water Pipes." The result of experiments made by him was that, under ordinary circumstances, wood, wool, cotton, paper and such like substances would not fire under or even at the boiling point of mercury (680 deg.); and very probably the temperature at which they would ignite readily was nearer 800 deg. than 700 deg. The highest temperature he was able to get on a high-pressure hot-water pipe was 500 deg., and he got that only by very hard firing, and by loading the safety valve. The usual high pressure apparatus seldom reached 400 deg., and, therefore, he concluded, that under ordinary circumstances those pipes could not originate a fire. Mr. Proctor said that mice, attracted by the warmth, often made their nests in close proximity to the pipes, and thus collected quantities of highly combustible material from which fires might originate.

A Glib-Talking Fakir.

A contemporary describes the lingo of a fakir the writer came across the other day following in the wake of Forepaugh's circus. The same fellow will be found at our country fairs next fall. His talk was as constant as the flow from Niagara; no period, colon, semicolon or comma: "Yesterday I sold this almost priceless object to-day I am giving them away simply giving them away as an advertisement for the ridiculous sum of ten cents or a dime to-morrow I may be selling them again thank you sir it magnifies as well as any three-dollar microscope and you are getting it for the paltry sum of ten cents it is recommended by all the most celebrated lawyers doctors ministers and scientific men as the most wonderful invention of the age and the gentleman here takes one why it is worth one dollar alone to examine a drop of water before you drink it and you will plainly see the seven kinds of insects in each drop ants grasshoppers crickets bees flies beetles and centipedes look at them and then drink your water and the gentleman here takes one thank you and you'll thank me before the day is over and the little boy takes one ten cents or a dime it's worth more than that to see the skin on your hand thank you sir," etc.

A Suspicious Addition.

Daughter—When I marry, mamma, it will be for love—

Mother—Do not talk like a simpleton, dear.

Daughter—As I was about to observe when you interrupted me, when I marry it shall be for love of position, ease and display. Business before sentiment, mamma?

Mother—Spoken like a heroine! (sotto voce) I must keep an eye on that girl or she'll run away with the first beggar that looks cross-eyed at her.

How He Made His Fortune.

Uncle Clearwater (noted temperance apostle, on a visit to his nephew, looking out of window)—What a fine building that is across the way!

Nephew—Yes; but the owner built it out of the blood, the aches and groans of his fellow-men, out of the grief of crying children and the woe of wailing women.

Uncle C.—Ah! A rumseller, of course! Yes, yes!

Nephew—Oh, no; he's a dentist.—Toronto Grip.

PROF. WM. H. THOMPSON, M. D., University of New York, New York city, says: "More adults are carried off in this country by chronic kidney disease than by any other one malady except consumption." This shows that Dr. Thompson considers kidney disease a frightful malady. He also says, "Bright disease has no symptoms of its own, but has the symptoms of every other disease." The reason why Warner's Safe Cure cures so many different diseases is that by curing symptoms, which are called diseases, it strikes at the roots of disease itself.

There is said to be a stream near Tucson, Ari., which petrifies every soft substance put into it. A biscuit dropped into the crystal water is alleged to have been turned to stone within a few minutes.

A gunner of "B" Battery, Quebec, has just deserted from his regiment on the eve of his intended marriage, leaving a young and blooming prospective bride in tears. It seems the wedding day had been fixed, the church calls all duly made, rooms taken and furnished, and the wedding guests invited, when this gallant son of Mars weakened, turned traitor and fled.

The Story of a Will.

(From the Toronto Mail.)

To the Editor of the Mail:

Having seen a letter in your paper from Mr. John Cooper, of this town, reminded me of an incident which occurred about three years ago. A friend of mine, Mr. A. Seymour, was staying at Vermillion Bay, on the C.P.R, west of here. A legacy was left to him by an uncle in London, England. Mr. Seymour was in such bad health at the time that he thought he would not be alive when the legacy would reach here. He therefore wrote to me asking me to have his will prepared and sent to him for signature, etc., appointing me as the legatee in trust. The will was prepared by John M. Munn, Esq., barrister, of this town, and was sent to Mr. Seymour. It was returned to me duly executed, and is still in my possession.

In the same letter was a request to send half a dozen bottles of Warner's Safe Cure, and some pills. I sent them. I received a letter some time after asking me to send some more, as he was feeling much better. I did so, and the next I knew Mr. Seymour himself came to town and told me (and looked it) that he was a well man. He got his money through the Ontario Bank here, and is now in British Columbia, and was in good health when I last heard from him.

I may say that I know both Mr. and Mrs. Cooper well, and the facts in Mrs. Cooper's case are as stated in Mr. Cooper's letter.

You can publish this or not, as you think fit, as it is nothing to me either way.

Yours, etc., W. C. DODIE, J. P.

How to Serve Strawberries.

The strawberries that are coming in now are getting better and better every day. It has been suggested more than once that the proper way to serve the lucious red berry is to smother it with cream. This is a very good scheme, but a far better plan is to place the berries in a dish, at the bottom of which has been strewn some freshly-cut lemon peel. Put some more lemon peel on top of the berries. Cover the dish and let it stand in an ice box for ten or fifteen minutes. Put on some sugar at the end of that time, and then put on enough red wine to saturate the berries about three-fourths of the way up. Let the dish stand in an ice box sufficiently long to get the wine thoroughly cold. Then serve. The taste is something which cannot be described, but it is far superior to the taste of berries and cream. It is not necessary to use an expensive claret. One of the rich, fruity wines of California, Ohio or Jersey will answer. In fact, there is a flavor about any one of these vintages which mingles with the strawberry admirably. The other evening, in a little restaurant well known to some men who like good things amid odd surroundings, a young man had a dish prepared according to this way, which far surpasses dishes supposed to be prepared in a similar manner at some of the showy up-town eating places. He bought the box of berries at a grocery on the corner. They cost ten cents. One of the servants in the kitchen prepared the berries, and the house furnished the lemon peel and sugar for nothing. The wine used came from Vineland, N.J. It did not take much for the quart of berries, and there was plenty left in the quart bottle that the young man paid 50 cents for. The wine itself was better than could be obtained at many a more elaborate restaurant for a dollar.—New York Sun.

The Old Crank.

Twelve men on one side of street car.

Seven females on the other.

Eighth female bounces in and stands in centre of car in expectant attitude.

Expects at least four men to bob up, of course.

Seven women criticise her from head to heel, especially the set of her bustle.

Conductor looks in and is amazed that the twelve men don't come piling out to ride the rear brake.

Eighth female glares around and wonders if this is the 19th century.

"You women hitch along there!" says the old crank, pointing across the car. "There's room over there for four more like her."

They glare at him and thirst for his life.

"Then sit down on top of some of 'em!" he continues as he settles back.

Then there is a flutter—a hitch, and a space of five clear feet is made in the centre, and the eighth female sits down in the centre of it in a gingerly way and with a look of pain.

Not one of these seven will ever, ever take an introduction to her on the face of this earth, so help them Davy Jones!

A New Word.

We are indebted to the Baptist Courier for the new word, "authordox." It was, probably, a misprint, but it is a good word, nevertheless. When a man sets forth his own vagaries he is the author of the views presented, and so they are "authordox,' though they be far from orthodox. "Authordox," yes, it is a good word, and will come in well to describe many books, essays, articles and speeches.—Louisville Western Recorder.

STARVING THE TEETH.

Foods That are Good for Them and Foods That are Not.

Teeth are just as easily starved to death as the stomach. In one way it is a blessing to have been born of poor parents. What food the poor give their children is of the variety that goes to make strong bones and teeth. It is the outside of all the grains, of all cereal foods, that contains the carbonate and phosphate of lime and traces of other earthy salts which nourish the bony tissue and build the frame up. If we do not furnish to the teeth of the young that pabulum they require, they can not possibly be built up. It is the outside of corn, oats, wheat, barley, and the like, or the bran so-called, that we sift away and feed to the swine, that the teeth actually require for their proper nourishment. The wisdom of man has proven his folly, shown in every succeeding generation of teeth, which become more fragile and weak. These flouring mills are working destruction upon the teeth of every man, woman and child who partakes of their fine bolted flour. They sift out the carbonates and the phosphates of lime in order that they may provide that fine flour which is proving a whitened sepulchre to teeth. Oatmeal is one of the best foods for supplying the teeth with nourishment. It makes the dentine, cementum and enamel strong, flint-like and able to resist all forms of decay. If you have children never allow any white bread upon your table. Bread made of whole wheat ground, not bolted, so that the bran which contains the minute quantities of lime is present, is best. To make a good, wholesome, nourishing bread, take two bowls of wheat meal and one bowl of white or bolted flour, and make by the usual process. Nothing is superior to brown bread for bone and tooth building. This is made out of rye meal and corn meal. Baked beans, too, have a considerable supply of these lime salts and should be on the table, hot or cold, three times a week. In brushing the teeth always brush up and down from the gums instead of across. Brush away from the gum and on the grinding surface of the teeth.—American Analyst.

A Woman's Charms

soon leave her, when she becomes a victim to any one of the various disorders and peculiar "weaknesses" that are peculiar to the fair sex. The condition of tens of thousands of women to-day is pitiable in the extreme; they are weak, bloodless creatures, a prey to mental anguish and bodily pain; in a word "broken-down," from any one of numerous causes. To this unhappy multitude we strongly urge the use of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, an infallible, world-famed remedy for all "female" irregularities and "weaknesses," and which restores the worst sufferer to vigorous health, and reinvests her with all the charms of figure, face and complexion that receive such willing homage from man.

Yes, Oscar, it is true many of the famous poets have suffered from dyspepsia, but it is an error to infer that dyspepsia is an infallible sign of genius. It is only an evidence of an imperfect digestion and a disordered liver. Your poem, entitled "The first Dandelion of Spring" is merely one of the symptoms of a bilious attack. The next time your system is out of order take Dr Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets. They will restore the liver to its normal state, and promptly cleanse the system without any disagreeable after effects. The "Pellets" are entirely harmless—which is more than can be said of your poem, Oscar.

Do not miss the procession in the afternoon. Doors open at 7.30, to begin at 8 o'clock, p.m.

We devote our editorial space this week to "Across the Continent," which is becoming more and more interesting, if such is possible, as the clever writer proceeds. The country between Vancouver and San Francisco is comparatively new, and its characteristics are probably unknown to the great majority of our readers. The writer deals with its beautiful scenery and other features in a manner highly entertaining and instructive. Do not fail to read "Across the Continent," and also the very vivid description of the beautiful city of San Francisco - City of the Golden Gate when it appears.

The Dundalk Herald says that "Mr. Smith, of the Shelburne Economist, was in Dundalk last Thursday. We very much enjoyed the afternoon in his company." A rather strange instance, we should say, of folly enjoying the companionship of knowledge. It is a hopeful sign, however. The older you grow, Theophilus, the more you will you become impressed with your own inherent littleness, but don't get discouraged, and remember that "a vacant mind is an invitation to vice," and continue striving to enjoy the company of your superiors

Dominion Day.

The main attractive feature of Dominion Day in Flesherton will be the picnic of the Methodist Ladies' Aid on the lawn of J.W. Armstrong, Esq. This promises to be a very pleasant affair and should not be missed.

THE DAY IN PRICEVILLE.

A large list of prizes for games is offered to be competed for in Priceville. The other attractions are Caithumpian procession at 10 a.m., two baseball matches in the afternoon, between Durham Priceville and Flesherton clubs, Flesherton brass band, the Campbell Highland dancers, etc., which, taken altogether, constitutes a magnificent bill of fare which it will be unwise to miss. No doubt, as the large bills say, "Claun na Ghaidheal ri Guaibh cheile," and especially will they stand shoulder to shoulder next Monday at Priceville to make the affair a success.

AT FEVERSHAM.

Bills are also out stating that Feversham will celebrate the day in a right royal way with the usual games, etc. Feversham is a nice picturesque little place to spend the day in.

An Orange Goat.

Mr. D. Cook, of the station, undertook to purchase some goats the other day from a Catholic gentleman living in Glenelg, who was somewhat loath to sell However, said the owner of the animals, pointing out a yellow-colored goat, "there is a d—d Orangeman that you can have." Mr. Cook bought the Orangeman and his mother, but what he intends to do with them we have not heard.

Our Improvements.

Flesherton's road overseers are doing good work this spring in building sidewalks, culverts, crossings and drains. The school trustees are also not behind hand, and are terracing and otherwise improving the school grounds. A sidewalk has been laid from the street back to the school grounds, which greatly improves the approach. All of these improvements have been done in a very workmanlike and substantial manner. Flesherton is bound to blossom like the rose in the near future ; it could not be otherwise, for the people are aesthetic in their tastes admire art, music and flowers, and are even now striving to make the village known far and near as one of the prettiest, artistically, in Canada. Excelsior!

Special Announcement.

We feel confident that our patrons will appreciate the work, and be glad to avail themselves of this opportunity of obtaining a valuable book.

It is necessary that you mention this paper in sending for the "Treatise." This offer will remain open for only a short time.

The Home Coming.

Flesherton Company (No. 6) returned home from Niagara camp on Saturday evening. They were met at the station by Flesherton brass band and a large number of the villagers, who escorted them to the drill shed, where a luncheon was served. As usual Flesherton company obtained high honors and complements while in camp, and were mentioned by the daily Globe on Thursday last in the following terms :—"No. 6 Co. Flesherton, 31st Battalion, has been highly complimented on its cleanliness and neatness on the daily parades. It is considered the best drilled company in the batallion and had the honor of furnishing the whole of the main guard for Thursday.". This latter is an honor which has never, excepting on one or two occasions, been accorded to any one company. Three shouts and an elephant for Flesherton company, say we.

A member of the company tells us that their success was due in a great measure to the efforts of Captain Fields, who was ably assisted by Lieut. Brown of Brampton. We have been requested to express the thanks of the volunteers to the band for meeting them at the station, and to the ladies who entertained them with such excellent refreshments.

Theawfulass !

Theawfulass Hall, the minature editor of the Dundalk Herald, is knocked out of the ring ! He gave up the railway argument three weeks ago and veered off into personalities. Previous to that his arguments had flattened out and dissolved in the sunshine of facts which we gave him to digest, and in the last two articles which he has laboriously compiled not one word about railway monopoly or its answer to any of our charges was said. You see we "dropped onto his racket," found where the shoe pinched and extracted his corn. Poor Theawfulass is better now. It was also a case of monomania He had one grand object alone to live for and that was to smash the C.P.R. Company, but, as we remarked before, like the other Don Quixote, he only discovered his inability to do so after making one of the richest exhibitions of himself which it is in any man's power to make. Wherever his paper is read people are now laughing at his temerity in undertaking so herculean a task with the mighty small brain power at his disposal. We one time witnessed a fight between a bantam and an old rooster, in which the former dodged between the latter's legs and around him, but a few blows from the big fellow's spurs decided the little fellow that he had better get over the fence to his relatives, and when he arrived there he told them in eloquent terms how he had left the big fellow "squirming" on the ground under a "severe castigation." His wife drew his attention to the fact that half his comb was gone and one eye bunged up, wisely adding that he had better go to bed. Poor Theawfulass ! This story reminds us of another. Some men were driving piles. A boy came along with a cat in a bag which he intended to drown. The men persuaded him to place pussy on top of one of the piles. This was done, and when the two-ton weight came down on pussy, oh where was she ! She had spread out, and covered eight rods in diameter, including every one of the workmen's faces and a washing bee was in order. Did any one smell anything around Dundalk lately ? Ta, ta, Theawfulass. Requiescat in pace.

Character Development.

BY N. W. CAMPBELL, PUBLIC SCHOOL INSPECTOR FOR SOUTH GREY.

"One's character is the stamp of one's realest and innermost self." "One's realest and innerost self may be, it often is, very different from one s outer and apparent self." "One's character gains and grows through its free expression, and it limits itself and suffers loss through its forced repression." One's character and one's nature are not identical, nor are they always alike; and one's character may be the result of indulging, or of resisting, one's natural traits." By nature, a man may be quick-tempered and liable to bursts of passionate anger. If he were to give free expression to his feelings on all ocassions, his character would come to be that of a man of violent and ungovernable temper. But by the repression of his native impulses, that man may come to have the character of one who holds his temper in close control; and he may even pass for one who has no struggle in the mastery of his feelings under provocation."

We have now some conception of what constitutes character. But the word has another meaning. It is derived from a Greek word meaning to engrave. The process (of engraving) was slow and the product lasting. So is character and character-building. Charcter is not built in a day, or a month, or a year, but when once built is as enduring as the everlasting hills. Character is the sum total of those peculiar qualities impressed by nature or haibt on a person, which distinguish him from others. So, it may be good or bad, according as those impressions are good or bad. Taking this, its common meaning and remembering that our education, like our character, depends on our impressions, our surroundings, how careful we teachers in particular should be that the influences which surround the child (in school) are such as will help to build up a good character, that those things which hinder development in this direction should be as far as possible removed from him.

Are we as teachers, sufficiently impressed with the infinite importance of Character? Do we remember that after our bodies have returned to dust, when our works shall be tried by fire, when all things else we have, or have done, shall perhaps be cast aside or forgotten or destroyed that we shall actually have to fall back on our character? Are we aware that our character is for us the book of life, and that everything we do—great or small—is unerringly written there; that it is the only thing we can take with us out of the world and the only thing that will be of service to us in the world to come? Do we keep in mind that apart from Revelation, if we are to respect the two great fundamental principles of science—continuity and development—Character is the all-important factor of life? The principal of continuity asserts that we shall continue in some state of existence after this life, and that of development that we shall go on in that existence much the same as we have in this that if our lives have been good here they will be better hereafter, and if bad here, they will be worse hereafter. Such is the principle of growth. How infinite in importance therefore is the building up of a sterling, upright, true manly character. As teachers, we should bear in mind also that "as the tree falls, so it shall lie;" and this, "The time is at hand. He that is unrighteous let him do unrighteousness still; and he that is filthy let him be made filthy still; and he that is righteous let him do righteousness still; and he that is holy let him be made holy still. Behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me to render to each man according as his work is." that is, according to his character, for his character is the abiding product of his works whether good or evil.

In this sense, "Character" is used broadly, not in that narrow, limited way in which it is used when we speak of business character, national character and such like. It is the parent of all these and embraces all. It is too wide, too comprehensive, to be applied to any particular action, calling, time. It reaches beyond these and pierces even to the eternal. It is the backbone, the soul of all that is good and beautiful and true in man. Man cannot aim higher than to have a perfect, elevated moral character. The highest character is no less than the Divine in man and in the Divine Man alone is the highest type seen. The nearer we approach Him the more perfect we are and we are enjoined to press onward to perfection. The development of true character is thus the end, the highest end of any system of education. In so far as a system of education tends to promote this end, so far only is it a good system. A man may possess superior mental talents, and have acquired much intellectual garniture; he may be a giant physically and understand the science of physical development perfectly, and yet his influence in a community may be degrading. We see then where this question touches our work. It is really at the beginning, at the end, and from the beginning to the end. We must never lose sight of it. Development of character is or should be our aim in the school room, and all our teaching, whether in the physical or intellectual lines, should be done with this end kept steadily in view.

It would be an interesting question to trace how far the study of the common branches of education tends to the development of character. Further it would be interesting to consider whether the daily example of the true teacher coupled with his wisdom in dealing with individual cases be not a more potent factor in the development of character than intellectual and physical training combined. I may have occasion to touch upon these questions later on. At present I leave it to each teacher here, to ponder seriously whether he or she has aided in the past, in the development of the moral faculty of the pupils, as well as in that of the intellectual and the physical.

It has been well said that manliness or manfulness is the perfection of human character. It has also been said that true manliness is gained only through conflict with evil. This being so, what have we? That the perfection of human character is gained only through conflict with evil. This conflict must first be necessarily in ourselves. The evil in ourselves must first be brought into subjection before we can direct others how to conquer the evil in themselves. The same order must be followed by the pupils. Self must first be overcome, and we are to show them how. This is part of our work, and not the lightest part, nor the easiest of performance. Yet we must not shrink from it if we would do our whole duty. What light does this throw on our relations to our pupils? How carefully we should come in and go out before them! How little we often think of the infinite possibilities of those who come within the range of our influence, and consequently, of our infinite responsibility for that influence. Clearly then, no one should be a teacher whose moral character is not unsullied, whose example the pupils may not safely follow, whose influence in and out of school is such as would poison instead of brighten the life of his pupils.

I would now trace briefly how Character may be developed, and what agencies are most potent for its development in the right direction. First, how is a lofty character developed?

Leaving aside the question of the new birth of a good character I would say that a lofty character is built up largely from habit. This statement may seem too strong but I think it is grounded on facts. Our habits are like our faces—no two alike. So are our characters. Our habits are formed by a slow and gradual process, so are our Characters. "Habit is a cable, we weave a thread every day and at last we can't break it." Here also is the process of growth. The fixed habit, like the cable, is the result of putting one tiny habit (thread if you like) with another or others. Our fixed habits (moral habits of course) are ourselves—our realest and innermost selves—that is, our characters. Who has not marked in himself the ease with which he does that which has become habitual—no matter how difficult at first it is second nature now, yea, first nature or even above nature. More than this, our habits indicate our characters. Is a man given to profanity, to indulgence, to any vice, is he not at once set down low in the scale of morals? On the other hand, if a man is self denying, truthful and honest, is he not classified high in morality? And each of these comes to man as the result of habit. How hard for a boy or man to utter the first profane word, to take the first drink, to tell the first lie, how easy the subsequent ones! So also in the practice of the better virtues, how hard for a man to deny himself the first time something which he greatly desires! How hard to tell the truth when it brings shame to the teller! How hard to be honest when so many are dishonest, when money is lost by being honest and gained by dishonesty! How easy, comparatively speaking, the subsequent exercise of these virtues, when they have become the habit of the soul. New strength is gained with every effort to resist evil or to practice good. Good habits are therefore necessary to the proper development of a good character.

The Trysting-Place.

Westward over the pale-green sky
The rosy pennons of sunset fly;
Nestward slowly the great rooks hie,
With cawing and labored flapping;
The bushes blend in a vagueness dark,
And the further trees stand tall and stark;
I hear the rushes whisper and shake,
As a flutter of wind begins to wake.
And louder grows
In the quick repose
The sound of the river's lapping.

Still half an hour, by the abbey chime!
I come to the tryst before the time;
I hearken the river's rippled rhyme,
And the sedge's rustled greeting,
And I cheat my heart with feigned fears,
And sigh as I wait (for no one hears),
To make the joy more rich and vast
When I feel his lips on my own at last
And hear no sound
As the world goes round
But the throb of our two hearts meeting.

Preferences and Treasures.

I'd rather drink cold water from the brook
Than quaff excitement from a golden chalice;
I'd rather sleep on straw in the shepherd's hut
Than lie awake and restless in a palace.

I'd rather earn dry bread in lusty health,
And eat it with a sense of wholesome pleasure,
Than feed without the zest of appetite
Off gorgeous plate and unavailing treasure.

I'd rather have one true, unfailing friend
Than fifty parasites to crave my bounty;
And one poor lass who loved me for myself
Than one without a heart who owned a county.

Nature is kind if our desires are pure,
And strews rich blessings everywhere around us;
While Fortune, if we pant in her pursuit,
Too often grants her favors to confound us.

Fresh air and sunshine, flowers and health and love,
These are endowments if we learn to prize them;
The wise man's treasures, better worth than gold,
And none but fools and wicked men despise them.

ESTELLE'S INFATUATION:

A NOVEL.

"I am not afraid of my share," she said, after a pause; "I don't think the townpeople would blame me. Master Charlie had been as my own, as one may say, and I cared for him as my own. There was no harm in helping him with money to marry the young lady he fancied; and I was not bound to send back Mrs. Harford to her husband. No one will say that. Queer as it may seem that a poor servant like me should be called on to provide, down to her very slips and shoe-leather, for the rich Squire Harford's wife, still no one will blame me; and I can go to jail because I helped my betters, as many a one has gone before me for no worser crime than that."

"You are a brazen hussy," said Mrs. Clanricarde, who could not get over the pain of knowing that she had been cheated for all these years of her rightful income after Mrs. Latimer's decease, and who, failing restitution, thought she ought to have revenge. "You are a brazen hussy, and you ought to be on the tread mill."

"Maybe," said Mary, speaking rapidly; "but before I go I'll tell the truth, and I warn you. They shall hear it all from the beginning. Master Charlie's death, that was never a death; and the back word come on Mrs. Harford's very wedding day itself, and no one man enough to tell her, and how she came to me for shelter when she found her old jo was alive; how me and mother took her in and kept her and Master Charlie for months and months, did we, and Squire Harford there at Thrift, rolling in golden guineas, as one might say—I'll not let a word go for want of telling. I'm ready if you are."

"Leave the room, woman!" said Anthony, sternly. "By George, you tempt me to forget myself!"

And Mary, knowing that her case was gained, with a significant glance at Anthony Harford's crutches, as one should say, "Who's afraid?" hurried from the room, and went down into the kitchen. And when there she partially opened the front of her dress and felt her stays, which crackled under her hand, lined as they were with bank-notes and bankers' vouchers.

"Them's safe," she said to herself, with a sigh of satisfaction; "and I'll get more out of them skinflints, or I'm a Dutchman. They've got to bribe me to hold my tongue. I'm not afraid of what they can say of me. Mr. Harford who's as proud as Lucifer, would he like to have it known that his runaway wife was hiding here under his very nose in his own house, beholden to such as we? That old she-cat may screech as much as she likes, she can do nothing. I've no call to be afraid of her."

And she spoke the truth. Circumstances compelled them to adopt, so far, a conciliatory course, and let this arch-offender go. She was free to depart when she would—she and her boxes. Her boxes, by-the-way, were rigidly overhauled, but not "so much as a candle-end," as she said, was found in them; and, for want of documents, no trace of moneys received by the sale of bronzes, china and the like, and safely invested in secure shares, forth coming. All was a blank, save the huge lumpsums set down in Mrs. Latimer's day-book, where the house-keeping expenses were ridiculously small and the subsidies granted to Mr. Charles Osborne as monstrously large.

"And this," said Mary, holding out a purse in which a florin, a bent shilling, and crooked sixpence were all the coins it contained—"and this is all the reward I am to have for all I have done?"

"You have that and an escape from jail," said Anthony Harford, sternly.

"And you, and Mrs. Clanricarde, and the whole lot of you, that of the story not coming out in the papers," said Mary in reply, defiant to the last. "But I have not enough to pay my railway fare; and at least my wages are due."

"Here!" said Anthony Harford, flinging her a bank-note as one flings a bone to a dog.

She took it and courtesied; the conventional action recalled the conventional manner. Then with a saucy "good morning" all round, she went off with her boxes in her cab, and no one asked or knew where.

"I am glad that mother has gone, poor soul," she said, as she sank back in the corner of her railway carriage and wept genuine tears—the strain now relieved. "She'd never have faced it—never; she'd have broken down as sure as eggs is eggs; but I have more grit in me than she had, poor soul; and I am glad that she was spared."

So she passed into darkness as black as that of interstellar state, and no one ever recognized in the sober, well-conducted Mary Dance—Sunday-School teacher of the Methodist chapel on the outskirts of——, the county town—the woman who had acted for 10 years and more a living lie, and whose mother had personated a dead lady to draw her income and make it into sufficient annuity for her daughter's lifetime.

"She ought to have been prosecuted," said Mrs. Clanricarde, when the thing was over and done with.

"She's best left alone," said Anthony Harford.

"And she was kind to my poor Estelle," chimed in that foolish George.

"And it would have been better for every one if she had not been," snapped Mrs. Clanricarde, her shrill voice at its highest pitch.

Her husband looked at her with a strange expression of mingled fear and aversion. Anthony's face showed only the aversion without the fear.

"Let the dead bury their dead," he said, sternly. "If truth could be measured like land, perhaps some of our acres would not fetch much. Now that you have your income, Mrs. Clanricarde, perhaps you could afford to be generous to the victim you yourself made."

"If I made her you took her, victim or not," retorted Mrs. Clanricarde. "You hold yourself high, Anthony Harford; that poor uncouth Caleb Stagg towers head and shoulders above you!"

With which Parthian shaft she swept away, even as Mary had done, and this history knows her no more.

CHAPTER XV.

THE DAWN OF DAY.

The pendulum of human life beats with constant regularity, and the sum of happiness or misery is pretty equally maintained if not evenly distributed. On one side we have sorrow, madness, death—on the other, fulfilled ambition, radiant hopes, delighted love, a brillant future. By the average—that most disappointing of all the equations made by facts and figures—those who have drawn blanks have nothing to complain of, seeing that their neighbors hold the prizes—that those prizes are of sufficient quality and number—and that thus the general verage is maintained.

There were the Smythe Smiths, for instance. What a handful of prizes they had drawn! and of what a fine unclouded blue their sky was painted. The marriage with Lady Venetia put the coping-stone on the pleasant edifice of their fortunes. It gave just the clamp and mortar they wanted to conslidate their holding, and clasped them to the Upper Ten as by adoption, if not by inheritance. It was the culmination of their hopes, and the last fortress they had set themselves to win. What more remained to be conquered would be revealed in time. For that truth, so well known to mountain climbers—of further peaks still forever revealing themselves as this and this are gained—is as true to the ambitious, whose last attainment is only a stepping-stone to another endeavor.

The wedding had been a gorgeous affair, for the bridegroom had been generous and the bride's parents were not too sensitive. If money be the chief factor in a transaction, what folly it is to pretend disinterestedness and act coyly! And to do the Lacklands justice, they did not err on that line by a hair's-breadth, but accepted relief proffered by their future son-in-law as graciously as it was offered, and liked him all the better for his munificence. After the wedding the young people had gone off for a tour round the world in the famous yacht of former days, which once had borne away poor Charlie Osborne. She had been redecorated and overhauled from keel to topmast, and was now one of the best and safest and most comfortable of her kind. And as, fortunately for every one, Lady Venetia was a good sailor and not a coward, the trip had been a success, and no regrets were added as footnotes to the text.

A year had passed since this bright chapter had been written in the Golden Book of Upperfold—a year which had been to Anthony Harford one of blackest gloom, now beginning to shade off into a lighter but still sufficiently dismal tone. Lady Elizabeth had not been to Thorbergh since the catastrophe of Estelle's death, and no event of any importance had broken the monotony of his dull days. Still, he lived on with a kind of undefined hope at the back of his consciousness, as one who sees a ray of light—unformed, but always light—at the end of a dark alley. He knew that life had not exhausted all its joys for him, and that Fortune would not always be the jade she had shown herself of late.

The honeymoon had repeated itself twelve times, and the month had lengthened out into a year, when Lawrence Smythe Smith and his young wife returned to England to cast anchor for a time at Upperfold until they had decided on their own special mooring. The rejoicing over the return of the son and heir were to be of the most resplendent kind; and the programme, as drawn out by the London organizer hired to give form to the feelings of the Smythe Smiths, was eminently satisfactory. Our cousins across the Atlantic put this tangible shaping of their feelings in a very crude form, "How much are you sorry for?" in the subscripton list of a charity has its analogue in the "How much are you glad for?" in the outlay of a welcome.

Mr. and Mrs. Smythe Smith were glad for a very large sum indeed, and the neighborhood would be the gainer. Games, shows, all sorts of diversions in the park, would please the trivial minds of the simple and untutored. A tenant's dinner would appeal to their more solid appreciation. A children's tea, with useful gifts for wear and toys as the lighter fringes, would be a fair bid for a generation of popularity; and the fireworks at night would delight all alike. In the house a stately banquet was arranged for friends and guests of equal standing, to be followed by a ball and an illuminated garden. It was a programme that did infinite credit to the organizer all through, and it was sure not to be marred by injudicious economies. Mr. and Mrs. Smythe Smith were glad of their son's return by a very handsome sum, indeed, and, never parsimonious, they were now truly regal in their output.

Among those to be asked as intimates, and of course, were the Kingshouses. The days were passed when this intimacy had been the bluest of all their blue ribbons to the Smythe Smith's; but they still cherished a warm and kindly feeling, just edged with by-gone gratitude, for the family which, first of all their then social superiors, had stretched out the right hand of fellowship to them, and treated them as autochthones, not sojourners. There was, perhaps, the finest shade of difference in their tone toward them; but it was very fine, very delicate, and the Kingshouses were not susceptible. So Mrs. Smythe Smith wrote a warm and pressing letter of invitation, feeling that if Lord Kingshouse would come on their side he would match Lord Lackland's and Lady Venetia's, and keep the balance equal. My lady too, colorless and important as she was in person, would be of value in name; and Lady Elizabeth was always a safe card to play. She had been "booked" from the beginning—Mrs. Smythe Smith having always her eyes fixed on probabilities. She remembered certain things which made her see ulterior chances, and she was all the more confirmed in her belief by Lady Elizabeth's persistent abstention from Thorbergh since Estelle's death. Wait till the year was out, and then—

Since Estelle's death Lady Elizabeth had neither visited the Smythe Smiths nor seen Anthony Harford. Something as indefinite as the hope lying at the back of his conscience had held her from coming to Thorberg during this first year of his widowerhood. She had kept up a kindly and continuous but not frequent correspondence with him, which had given her thoughts occupation; but he had never said he wanted to see her until now, when the great fete day was fixed, and he knew that she was coming to Upperfold. Then he broke out into a curious little dithyramb of joy at the prospect of meeting her again, and even added the hope that she would stay a long time at Upperfold—for his sake. He missed her, he said, out of his life more than she could possibly imagine, and he was looking forward to the pleasure of her society with a school boy's delight. A year was a long time for the separation of two faithful friends—and faithful friends they had been from the first and would be to the end. But for the painful memories hanging about Kingshouse, but for his abhorrence of one of the people at Les Saules and his contempt for the other, he would have gone over long ago to see her, Lady Elizabeth, the Delight of his Long ago; but as things were, the effort would be too great, and even he was not given to needless self-torture. It would be all right when she should be here and they were able once more to talk face to face, as in the happy days of their first acquaintance.

And when Lady Elizabeth read this letter she first blushed for joy, and then for shame of that joy; and hid it in her bosom with a strange feeling of sacred possession and a sense of divine secrecy, like some great splendor of thought shared between her and God. But alas for that second blush! When she went to bed she took the letter out of her bosom and kissed it with a passion, a self-abandonment, which no one who knew her only from the outside would have recognized as her characteristic at all.

"I know that I love him," she said to herself. "I always have. I should be ashamed to confess this—but I am not ashamed! I cannot feel sorry for myself. It is so natural to love him! Now that he is alone—poor, poor Estelle!—there is no sin in it. There was not at the first, and there is not now. Ah, if he could care for me so that I might make him happy and build up his home again! Ah!" she said aloud, and her voice broke into audible sound, "would that I could!"

So far Lady Elizabeth proved herself no child of this strange, cold, calculating generation. She was not ashamed to still love, having been so far cheated by appearances in the beginning as to have imagined herself sought when she was only observed. She had not been sought. Anthony's path had branched off from hers, and he had followed another no; herself. Nevertheless, she still stood where she had been when he had left her for Estelle, five years ago now; and the love she had given she had never recalled. It had been covered down and hidden out of sight while Estelle lived. For one moment of self-betrayal it had broken out, to be damped down as vigorously as before, when its unlawful passion stung too sharply. But now when there was no sin in the feeling there was no shame in the confession. And Lady Elizabeth was too sincere not to know herself, and too strong in her essential purity to be afraid of the truth.

The fickle skies of our untrustworthy summers were for this once favorable to concerted plans, and no day could have been more lovely than this of the young people's fete. The heaven was cloudless save for a few wisps and curls of vapor that softened the glare, and the south wind that stirred the leaves and made them "sweet to hear," like those oak leaves on Helvellyn, brought the sense of freshness which prevented the summer heat from becoming too oppressive. It was just enough, too, to lift the flags away from the masts, and shake them into life and movement—to carry the scents of the rarer and sweeter flowers in gusts of special perfume, that were as the high lights in a picture—the dominant notes in a melody—the accentuation of a scheme of color. The whole thing was pure perfection; and man and nature met in strangely complete harmoniousness. From the one, sorrow seemed to be surely banished for evermore—to the other, storm and tempest seemed a state impossible to come again. It was a day wherein to live was good—a day when no one ought to weep or die.

The park was thronged with holiday-makers in their hundreds. They had come from all parts of the county and beyond, determined to enjoy themselves after the manner of the British Philistine—God save his rude and thick skinned soul!—not abashed by sentimental regard for æsthetic rules. Loud laughter, louder cheers, broke through that indescribable hum of human voices heard from afar—so like and yet so unlike the hum of bees within a hive or in the lime blossoms overhead. Spots and stripes and lines of color moved across the grass, or wound in and out the clumps of trees set in groups about the park; and distance gave the gay gowns and ribbons of the women a chromatic value not to be found on nearer view. Little children played and ran, and fell like balls indued with will; and not the least interesting of the various parts composing the living picture were these small creatures given up to enjoyment like so many birds or lambs. Here a spangled juggler flashed his knives in the sun, or sent up his golden balls as quick as showers of light; there a Punch's show squeaked the old deathless drama and rattled out modern tunes on the Arcadian pipes; here a group of fine-limbed acrobats showed their strength and muscle; and there a merry-go-round tried the stability of heads and whose could longest resist dizziness and sea-sickness. And here again some with appetites sharper than the rest had found a convenient dining-room somewhere in the shade, and were emptying their handkerchiefs and lightening their baskets with the gusto of the hunger that is born of pleasure.

Lady Elizabeth and her father were standing on the terrace that dominated the garden and looked over to the park. Lady Kingshouse was within. Not even on such a summer's day as this did she venture much into the open air, and her embroidery had become to her by now what all hobbies become—her very life.

"I suppose Anthony Harford will come over?" said Lord Kingshouse suddenly.

He and his daughter had been standing quite silent for some little time, both apparently watching the scene, and each thinking of something else.

"I suppose so,' answered Lady Elizabeth.

Her cheeks flushed just as much as if a handful of monthly roses had been held near them and the sun had thrown the reflection of their color on her face.

"Ah, that marriage of his was a blunder," said my lord, with a sigh for the one part, a shrug for the other.

"It was a pity," she answered.

"That poor misguided girl!" he continued. "I was deuced sorry for her all through."

"Yes," said Lady Elizabeth; "she suffered as much as any; perhaps more than any."

"If we had not had that dinner, Delight, it might never have come to pass," said the earl, meditatively. "I have often thought how strangely great things come about by small causes. That dinner to have ruled the destinies of three people!"

"Yes," she said. And she said no more. She found the conversation difficult.

Just then they saw a horseman come along the park road, which ran along the garden wall. It was a cross kind of road, made for the convenience of the family when their business lay to the east and not to the south or west. It was the road which gave into the highway leading on to Thrift.

"That looks uncommonly like Harford!" said the earl.

"I think so, too," said Lady Elizabeth, who knew that it was he.

And then the horseman, seeing them, took off his hat and settled the question of his identity. In a few minutes more they heard his voice in the room behind them, talking to Lady Kingshouse and expressing his pleasure at seeing her again.

The earl stepped back out of the sunshine into the cool shadow of the room. Lady Elizabeth turned half around in the attitude of a person expectant but not to avoid—with a welcome ready when claimed, but not thrust forward with too much insistance. Her lips were parted into a smile which had in it the crisp lines of pain as well as the frankness of pleasure, and her eyes were dilated till their tender gray was transformed to black. Anthony shook hands with Lord Kingshouse, and repeated the cordial phrases he had used to the countess, but he saw only Lady Elizabeth as she stood on the terrace, half in profile and all in sunlight, her eyes turned to the park, while her heart and her senses were in the room. Then, the rightful amount of attention bestowed upon the authorities, Anthony came out on to the terrace, the hands of the two friends met, and his eyes looked on her with that long searching look which seemed as if it would scan her very soul and never be weary of what it saw.

It was not Anthony's way to be hilarious or boyish. Let his mirth be ever so strong, it was deep rather than broad, and always more quiet than demonstrative. Those who knew him best would have seen most clearly how he enjoyed all the circumstances of the day, while ever maintaining his ordinary demeanor of self-restraint and the repose which goes with dignity. He went out of his way more than once to show the Smythe Smiths the sympathy of a neighbor and a fellow-landowner with all they had planned and done; and he congratulated them on the success of their fete, and even carried the beauty of the day to the good of their account—as if the skies had been swept clear by their bosoms and the south wind had been blown through their bellows. He was the very acme of amiability, the very perfection of kindly courtesy: and every one said how brave Squire Harford looked to-day the first day, indeed, that he did not seem to be haunted by his poor wife's ghost.

He did not laugh; he did not joke; he did not make sly grimaces expressive of his ebullient spirits; but he impressed them all with the sense of his hidden joy, and Mrs. Smythe Smith, for all her preoccupation with her own concerns, said once to her husband, in a meaning whisper, "What has come to Anthony Harford? He looks as if he met an angel by the way!"

"Perhaps he did," said her husband, who knew as well as she how things stood.

So the glad day passed, and then Anthony left for the hour, and more, that it would take him to ride back to Thrift and return to Upperfold clothed as a Christian gentleman should be for a dinner and a ball. No word had been said, but Lady Elizabeth's heart was full of that half-confessed joy which has its other name in fear. He had looked so much—he had made her feel so much; and surely he was not the kind of man to wilfully mislead and cruelly betray! He had made her feel that he loved her—that she could give him back his lost happiness, and replace the absent in his heart. And what more does a true woman ask than to be of good service to the man she loves? He had deceived her once unwittingly, or rather she had deceived herself; but this time surely she was not following a marsh light! Surely he loved her, and would prize her love for him! She was no longer the mere childish ingenue who does not realize her own sensations. She was a woman who understood life—save in such forms of vice and vileness as come but rarely into a good woman's province to understand it all.

The dinner passed as such functions always do—in enjoyment for the sympathetic; in excitement for the young; in bliss or despair for the secretly loving as they chanced to be placed and mated. To Anthony and Lady Elizabeth it was a time of pleasure beyond the reach of words, for they were together—and that was enough.

As the evening wore on the ball began; the garden was illuminated, and the fireworks flung up columns of flames which came down in showers of stars. All the guests left the ball-room and gathered on the terraces looking at the glow-worm-like lamps among the flowers, and the splendor of those artificial asteroids falling like golden rain from heaven. Many a word was whispered in that balmy, moonless, perfumed night that would never have been said in the day; and many a rash caress was given, for weal or woe, as the chance of fortune might prove.

Under the shadow of the thick trellis that led to the rose garden Anthony and Lady Elizabeth stood as they had stood on that fateful day in his study, by the table where he had laid his revolver. His arms were round her waist; her hands were on his shoulders; but his face was closer to hers than it had been then, and his voice was sweeter, as he asked, with a lover's insatiable insistence: "Tell me again, oh Delight, that you love me."

"I do," she said, gently. "I always have."

He pressed her to him fondly.

"At last the long night is over," he said. "The day is breaking, and our sun of happiness has risen."

THE END.

For Best Results in Butter Making.

It is generally conceded that for best results in butter making, where the milk should be placed in the creamer as nearly as possible at the temperature at which it is drawn from the cow, there being a considerable loss of fat in skim milk if the milk is allowed to cool to any great extent before being set. Of late there has been considerable controversy as to whether it is advisable under any conditions to warm the milk before setting, and as to the limit of temperature beyond which it is not safe to go.

Mr. I. P. Roberts concludes, as the result of investigations at the College of Agriculture at Cornell University, that, first, there is a loss of butter when the milk is allowed to cool much below the normal heat of the cow before being put in the creamer; second, while there may not be any very great increase of butter when the milk is heated, there is no risk of injuring the quality of the butter by incorporating an excess of caseine, even when the milk is heated as high as 135 degs.

The Brompton Hospital for Consumptives, London, England, publishes a statement that 52 per cent. of the patients in that institution had unsuspected kidney disease. Every drop of blood in the system passes thousands of times through the lungs in each 24 hours. The same blood passes through the kidneys for purification. If the kidneys are not in a healthy condition or able to expel the poisonous waste matter the acids return to the delicate tissues of the lungs and produce irritation which results in the symptoms of what is known as consumption. This explains why 52 per cent. of the consumptive patients have unsuspected kidney disorder. Warner's Safe Cure puts the kidneys in a healthy condition, taking the acids from the blood which vitiates the lungs and causes consumption.

FASHIONABLE FANCIES.

Oddities in Feminine Apparel Just Brought Out.

The white cotton dresses are gayly decorated with white ribbons.

The latest of the new Oriental laces are mixed in ecru and white.

Charming house dresses are finished with watteaus of black and white lace.

The flower bonnets are the prettiest of the novelties in dainty French millinery.

Bathing gowns are in great variety and may be had all the way from $2 to $50 each.

Sashes of surah can now be obtained complete, even to the knotted, silk-fringed ends.

Some of the new leg-o'-mutton sleeves are buttoned closely at the wrist. Six buttons are used.

A late fancy in neck lingerie is the deep, falling plisse and the narrow, upright ruche of sulphur-yellow gauze.

The new mohairs come in all shades of color in "shot" effects and in bars, plaids and checks of great beauty and effectiveness.

Hats and bonnets of straw are now dyed in every tint known to nature. Several of the colors are sometimes woven in on the chapeau.

Among other wraps recently revived in London is the long, straight scarf mantle. It is worn around the shoulders and falls to the hem of the dress in front.

The Jane Hading sleeve is of coat-sleeve shape and has at the top an extra quantity of material that is formed into four downward-turning plaits, the wrist being finished by a reversed portion in the shape of a cuff, under which is placed a tiny cuff.

The principal trimmings of tulle, net, gauze and lace dresses are ribbons. Some dresses are fairly covered with them. Long loops and ends flutter from waist to hem and are placed zigzag across the gown. Instead of being run row after row around the skirt they are arranged so as to describe vandykes.

The main difference between the bathing gowns of this and those of last season is in the cut of the waist, many of the new gowns being cut with several seams so as to fit the form quite closely. Then, again, more trimming is used than formerly, many of the suits being profusely braided with very fine braid put on in scroll or other fancy pattern.

An art dress recently seen in Paris is described as a "triumph of dressmaking." It is of the new soft, semi-transparent wool called crepaline, of a pale vieux-rose shade, with reseda-green ribbon girdle and old lace in Venetian design laid on as a very wide antique collar and on the deep cuffs of the mutton-leg sleeves. The surplice corsage has a well fitting blouse back, but the ribbon girdle is confined to the front, forming a point as it ties. The skirt, made with no steels and but a slight bustle, is laid in very fine plaits, with rows of ribbon at the foot. A large Gainsborough hat of vieux-rose straw is worn with this costume.

Did Eve Talk French?

No subject has been more fertile of speculation than the origin of language, and on few perhaps can less satisfaction be obtained. The Jews positively insist that the Hebrew tongue is the primitive language and that spoken by Adam and Eve. The Arabs, however, dispute the point on antiquity with the Hebrew. Of all the languages, except the Hebrew, the Syriac has had the greatest number of advocates, especially among eastern authors. Many maintain that the language spoken by Adam is lost and that the Hebrew, Chaldee and Arabic are only dialects of the original tongue. Goropius published a work in 1580 to prove that Dutch was the language spoken in Paradise. Andre Kemp maintained that God spoke to Adam in Swedish, Adam answered in Danish, and Eve spoke in French, while the Persians believe three languages to have been spoken in Paradise—Arabic, the most persuasive, by the serpent; Persian, the most poetic, by Adam and Eve, and Turkish, the most threatening, by the Angel Gabriel. Erro claims Basque as the language spoken by Adam, and others would make the Polynesian as the primitive language of mankind. Leaving, however, these startling theories, we may sum up in the words of Darwin: "With respect to the origin of articulate languages, after having read on the one side the highly interesting works of Wedgewood, Farrar and Professor Schleicher, and the celebrated lecture of Professor Max Muller on the other side, I cannot doubt that language owes its origin to the imitation and modification, aided by signs and gestures, of natural sounds, voices of other animals and man's own cries."—Current Literature.

The Silver Quarters.

A paragraph which appeared in a contemporary a few days ago to the effect that all silver quarters which do not bear a small cap "H" on the reverse side under the knot are counterfeit, has created consternation in some parts of the country. The statement was not correct. A majority of the silver quarters do not bear the letter "H" at the place mentioned. The explanation of the mark is this: All British coins are supposed to be issued from the Royal mint, and the large majority in circulation have been so issued. Now and again, however, the pressure of work at the mint becomes so great and urgency being necessary some coinage has to be done outside, the firm employed for this purpose being Messrs. Ralph Heaton & Sons, of Birmingham. All coins struck by them are stamped with an "H" to distinguish them from the Royal mint issue.

There is a strike on the Brockville & Westport Railway against monthly instead of weekly payments, which formerly prevailed.

Seven girls in a ladies' seminary near Northampton have been suspended for smoking cigarettes made of tea leaves which they rolled together themselves. This is the latest fad among gay and fashionable girls.

Margaret Huston, one of the persons injured in the railway accident near Armagh, has died from her injuries. Business still remains suspended in Armagh. The only sounds disturbing the dull monotony of the streets are caused by the frequent funeral processions to the churchyard outside the town.

A ROMANCE OF A CLERGYMAN.

Labors of Self-Sacrifice of Father Hope, Belonging to the Scotch Nobility.

A young priest has just died in the northwest of London whose name may well be saved from oblivion, says the Telegraph of that city. Under circumstances less sensational than those which have made Father Damien's name ring through Christendom, Father Douglas Hope has practiced, in the unromantic monotony of the Harrow road, a self-surrender as complete as that of the hero of the leper island. Close to that landmark of the 'bus man, "The Prince of Wales," stands a home for boys, and in connection with it a bakery and printing works. The place was founded by the Rev. Lord Archibald Douglas, a brother of the Marquis of Queensberry and of Lady Florence Dixie. He brought his fortune and the fervor of his new-found faith to his task. Even the Harrow road is not without its romance. Lord Archibald's sister, Lady Gertrude Douglas, joined her brother and identified herself with his renunciation of society, perhaps too completely, for during his absence in Canada, whither he had taken some of his waifs, she married the head baker and became Lady Gertrude Stock. Some five years ago Lord Archibald found his increasing cares too heavy for him. He retired to quiet mission life in Scotland and his place in the Harrow road was taken by his cousin, Father Douglas Hope. A great-grandson on his father's side of Lord Hopetown and on his mother's of the Duke of Buccleuch he "called cousins" with all the blue blood of Scotland. His father, Mr. Hope, of Luffness, was at one time member for Windsor, and his mother, a daughter of Lord Montagu, was an early bed-chamber woman to the Queen. But Father Hope had obliterated the traditions of his family and the memories of Eton and Christ Church when he went to St. Vincent's Home to be priest, teacher, father and nurse to seventy boys mostly rescued from the London streets. He shared their rough food and lived their life in school-room and play-ground. If he had ever thought of himself he might have known that in spite of his six feet of stature and his brilliant physique he was not seasoned for the rough life he had adopted. His entire devotion isolated him from his fellows in the outer world; but those who got glimpses of him were not astonished to hear that rheumatic fever had carried him away last Thursday afternoon. He was laid to rest yesterday in the cemetery at Kensal Green—not far from the scene of his five years' labor of love.

To Get Clover on Light Soil.

The droughts of a few years past have very generally destroyed the clover and grass seed sown. The all-absorbing question, on light and sandy lands in particular, is how to secure a good catch of clover. When this can be done, such lands produce well and are classed among our surest and most valuable farming lands. Barnyard manure will be indispensable in putting such wasted soils in condition to grow the clover. Every farmer has doubtless observed in the fields where he has sown clover seed that spots more fertile than the main portions of the field have been covered with a good growth of clover, showing that if the land was thoroughly fertilized the clover would grow whether the season was wet or dry. I should advise keeping all the stock possible on the farm and buying more or less wheat, bran and oil meal to feed the stock, and so increase the value of the manure pile. I should prefer buying commercial foods such as I have named for this work of renovating rather than commercial fertilizers. It might be well to try plowing under green crops, as rye or buckwheat. Sowing the clover seed without any other crop, after the land has been put in good tilth, either in the spring or the last of August, sometimes proves effective. Such lands are not adapted to permanent meadows. We are experimenting with alfalfa or lucerne on lands of this character, but have not had experience enough as yet to know its value. We have an acre sown last April that has gone into the winter in very good shape. I may add that I think salt and plaster will prove beneficial on such lands.

A Terrible Experience.

During the "wrecking" of the U. S. S. Trenton, after the storm at Apia, Lieut. Scott's waiting-boy managed to get for him a uniform and enough under clothes to fill two small pillow-cases. Everything else of his belongings were lost—even his watch and his books, which he regrets the most, as they were a valuable collection containing all the best works in his profession. During the storm the water and the atmosphere were bitterly cold, and the men worked hours in the pouring rain and furious wind, with feet and legs bare, cut, bruised and blistered by the debris driven about the decks, and no food but hard tack or something out of a can. Lieut. Scott fell on a plank with a nail in it, cutting his leg, and for over a week after the storm could not wear shoes. He caught cold and narrowly escaped pneumonia. An Australian lady and gentleman living at Apia, fixed up their parlor with a bed and insisted on taking him in and treated him with the greatest kindness. Lieut. Scott is brother to Mrs. Roberts, wife of the American consul here.

A Far-off Dream Recalled.

The Evening Post says that strawberries should be eaten with coffee and that "nobody has known the strawberry flavor excepting immediately after the clearing of the taste which comes from drinking coffee." This is nonsense. Nobody has known the strawberry flavor except he has, as a boy, flung himself on a cool grassy slope at the edge of a summer woods, after hours of barefooted rambling, and there sought out one by one the wild strawberries under the leaves and devoured them, beating a tattoo with his calloused heels on the seat of his patched trousers. Strawberries gathered and eaten under such circumstances have a flavor that no product of the garden served with sugar and cream, or swallowed between sips of coffee, may ever have. The boy who has so eaten of them "on honey dew both fed and drank the mill of paradise."—Rochester Post-Express.

RAISE THE KITCHEN STOVE.

A Simple Expedient that Would Save Many a Backache.

We have made a discovery lately which, it seems now, we ought to have made sooner, that the top of the average kitchen stove is too little elevated above the floor, and that there is in consequence a good deal of backache and other discomfort inflicted upon the cook because so much of her work has to be done in a stooping posture. Rather we should say, perhaps, that we have discovered a remedy for the trouble which we have borne for many years, and which we hasten to make known to others in the hope of lessening their troubles.

Our remedy is simply lifting the stove upon a platform which will raise it to such a height that it will bring the cooking utensils, when on the stove, within easy reach to one standing in an erect or nearly erect posture. In our case this required a platform about nine inches in depth, and to save the trouble and expenses of procuring a carpenter to build it we secured an empty packing-box of the requisite size from the grocer at a cost of only 10 cents. Brushed over with some staining material corresponding with the color of the floor, our platform looked neat and as though an established part of the room.

The only additional expense involved was that of adjusting the stove-pipe to the new conditions. The top of the stove is now as high as the kitchen table, or a little higher, and the cook and every one who has occasion to use the stove are delighted with the change and the greatly lightened labor.—Exchange.

PAINT ON FAIR CHEEKS.

Many London Women Do It, But Very Badly.

I was, the other afternoon, in the Park, and was looking at the ladies driving in their carriages. I take the liberty to give them a little advice. A considerable number of them had endeavored to "improve" their complexions, and, what is more curious, the young ones seemed to have done so even more than the elderly ones. But I never saw faces worse painted.

An American girl paints from her childhood upward! So, again, with French women. They know how to paint. But English girls know as little about it as savages. The white that they daub on their faces looks blue in daylight; their rouge becomes a pale magenta; the black line that they draw round their eyes gives their orbs a bead-like, expressionless air; the red that they put on their lips assumes a brownish tint, and darkens their teeth, and their attempts to better their eyebrows generally end in making one differ from the other.—London Truth.

A Few Farm Notes.

Nothing injures stock more than cold rains. It was the experience of the writer during a winter in the far north that his cattle did not suffer as much from 30 degrees below zero as they did from a cold rain in the spring. Keep the stock comfortable is the best way to insure profit in beef or butter making.

Keep the stock growing. When young give it food that will make it grow and develop bone and muscle, and when size is attained, rush it for the market by laying on the fat. The quickest growth is always the cheapest.

It is poor cows that cut the profits of the dairy down. It takes 150 pounds of butter to keep a cow a year; the cow that makes less than that is an expense, the cow that makes more is profitable. It is better to pay a hundred dollars for a cow that will make three hundred pounds of butter per year than to get one that will make only one hundred and fifty pounds for nothing. Don't complain that dairying doesn't pay till you know whether your cows are worth keeping or not. Stock may be kept in too close stables. There is not so much danger of this as the summer comes on as there is in the winter when every crevice is closed to keep out the cold. There is more danger from bad odors now, however, than in the cold of winter and there should be a free circulation of air to carry away any odor that may be injurious to the stock or milk.

A passenger of the train testified that when the train was stopped on the grade Moorehead placed a stone under a wheel of the last carriage and uncoupled a number of carriages. The detached portion immediately descended the grade at a rapid rate. The doors of all the cars were locked. The Court adjourned. McGrath and Moorehead were released on bail.

A MARY ANNE MILK PUNCH.

The Experience of the Ex-Manager of Oaklands With a New York Dude.

An energetic looking dude walked into the American Institute Building on Third avenue yesterday and asked Foreman Powers for the man in charge of the Jersey cattle to be sold at auction next week. Mr. Norton, in charge of Mr. Valancey E. Fuller's herd, was pointed out to him.

"Have you the wonderful cow Mary Anne of St. Lambert here?" asked the stranger. Mary Anne was pointed out to him.

"I am very anxious to secure a half pint of her milk," said the stranger.

"It is not milking time, and we have none left over," replied Mr. Norton.

"Bother milking time. It won't hurt her to give a half pint just now."

"Couldn't think of it," replied Mr. Norton.

"Now, really," persisted the dude, "I wouldn't mind $10 for a half pint of her milk, don't you know, if I can have it now."

"Come around at 5 o'clock and you can have it for nothing," said Mr. Norton.

"A tenner if I get it now," said the dude.

"I wouldn't milk her now for a hundred," said Norton.

The dude looked vexed and a little discouraged, but after a moment's reflection returned to the charge.

"I say, my man, of course I don't want to intrude upon time so valuable as yours, but if you have an assistant here who would be content with $10 for as little of his time as would suffice to milk a half pint for me I would be under lasting obligations for it."

"My time ain't so valuable as all that," replied Norton, "and if there were any sense in your asking for it I'd give it to you. What do you want it for?"

"Got my heart set on a Mary Anne punch," replied the stranger, partly closing one eye in a dreamy sort of way.

"Oh! ah! Yes—just so. I think I understand the feeling, but why not use other milk—you can get a milk punch anywhere."

"Sentiment goes a great way with me,' replied the dude. "Famous cow, you know—rare thing. Something to tell to future generations, don't you know."

"Of course—I see," said Norton, "but the fact is I've had charge of that cow several years and never thought of it before. No, thank you, I don't want your money, but the sentiment takes hold of me. I hope you wouldn't mind my joining you?"

The dude consented with excellent grace. Foreman Powers also got tangled up in the sentiment, and all three disappeared through a green baize door across the street, carefully guarding a tin pail containing the precious juice of the famous cow Mary Anne of St. Lambert.—New York Herald.

A Boy's Terrible Experience.

The Kingston News of Wednesday gives the following account: A short time ago a Kingston grocer found a tarantula in a barrel of bananas from Jamaica. He thought he had killed it, but it appears he was mistaken, as shown by his startling experience last night. On going into the bed chamber where his 10 year old son was in bed, he saw a horrified expression on the face of the lad. On following the direction of the son's eyes, he saw the tarantula on his bosom crawling slowly towards his head. The boy was game, and although the perspiration stood in large drops upon his blanched face, he never strained a muscle. The father stood transfixed and dared not stir for fear of disturbing the deadly animal. At last the spider slowly moved, and jumped on the poor boy's face. The brave little fellow still remained calm in this awful danger. For fully five minutes the tarantula remained on his cheek, and then skipped on to the counterpane. As it did so the father rushed forward and rolled the fabric round it, and then dashed it on the floor, crushing the life out of the fearful creature, and afterwards threw it in a fire to make sure this time that such a deadly "viper" had ceased to live. The little hero in the bed had fainted from the great stress upon his nerves, but upon coming to his senses was as lively as a cricket, and laughed at his late peril. When asked what his sensations were while the animal was crawling over him, he said: "I kept wishing papa wouldn't try to touch it, for fear it might kill him." It is a pity that the name of this plucky little fellow should not be known, but the father for many reasons wishes it to be so.

A Powerful Ally Shows Up.

He is here at last—the enemy of the potato-bug! Long has the patient husbandman waited his arrival, while alone he tussled with his hard-shelled persecutor. The parasite that slays the potato-bug has been a great while on the road, or he started late. He has had time to destroy the chinch bug, the locust and the apple-tree worm; but here he is at length. Success to him! May his teeth be sharp and his appetite superb!—Syracuse Standard.

WRITTEN IN MEMORY OF AGUSTA AKITT, THE DEARLY BELOVED WIFE OF J. B. HOGG OF EUGENIA.

Oh, thou art gone, thou much loved one,
Thy face we will see no more
Until we join that blood-washed throng
On Heaven's eternal shore.

Thy face once more we shall behold,
And on thy head a crown
Which never from thy brow shall fade,
Nor none can pull it down.

In grief and sorrow here we mourn,
And our sad loss deplore,
Thy little baby lisps thy name,
But mamma comes no more.

We know thou art with that blood-washed throng
On that celestial shore,
Where songs and gladness lasts for aye,
And joys for ever more.

We watched thee in thy hours of pain
Thou didst with patience bear,
Yet never dreamt that death so soon
Would claim a flower so fair.

Could love have kept thee on this earth
Thou would be with us still,
God loved thee best, He called thee home,
We bow beneath His will.

Its hard to break the ties of love
On earth that does us bind,
A loving husband, baby dear,
Father and sister kind.

But thou hast heard the Saviour say
My daughter, thou must come.
She gently closed her eyes and said,
"Father, thy will be done."

Even the last parting earth can know
To souls that heavenward soar,
Points to a brighter world on high
Where we shall part no more.

At a meeting of the Artemesia Orange District Lodge held in the hall of 1383, Kell's Corners, on June 11th, the following resolutions were passed :

Moved by J. Ashdown, seconded by C. Doupe. 1st, that this Loyal Orange District Lodge of Artemesia, now in session, do approve of the action of the noble thirteen members of Parliament who supported and voted for Col. O'Brien's motion for disallowance of the Jesuit Bill and that the thanks of the lodge are due to them for their action on that occasion. 2nd, that we do censure, disapprove and condemn the action of the se members, especially the three members for Grey, viz., Landerkin, Sproule and Masson who, by voting against the motion, dishonored their Protestant constituents and to gratify their own selfish political interests, proved traitors to the trust confided to them. 3rd, that we as Orangemen true to God, Country and Queen do pledge ourselves to support no man that will not pledge himself to stand for equal rights to all and special privileges to none 4th, that this lodge desires to place on record their strong disapproval of the action of the Ontario Government, in allowing the Roman Catholic Hierarchy to destroy the national system of public education throughout the Province by allowing foreign language to be taught to the exclusion of the English language and allowing text books to be used, not consistent with the public school laws of this province in our public schools. We therefore strongly recommend that in Ontario immediate steps be taken to give the Bible its proper place in our public schools; to prevent the legal recognition of any but the English language in the text books of the public and separate schools; to prevent the distribution of any public funds among schools whose teaching and text books are not under the direction and control of the Government; to secure equitable assessment laws for school purposes; and to remove from the statute books all laws giving special favors to any particular religious denomination

And that copies of these resolutions be sent to The Flesherton Advance and Orange Sentinel

ACROSS THE CONTINENT.

A Lady's Trip to the Golden State via C. P. R.

Down Through Oregon and California—Natural Soda Water Springs, Water Falls, and the Sacramento Valley—Arrival at San Francisco.

Specially Written for The Advance.

Leaving the hotel, we were driven a couple of blocks to the ferry where we had to cross over the Columbia river to take the train at East Portland. The boat was something like a scow or large raft with a little house built on it. One division is for passengers and the other for horses and carriages. From East Portland we get a fine view of the city on both sides of the river. It is indeed a handsome city. The rain has ceased; the sun is shining, and all nature seems alive, so that everything in the country looks beautiful as we pass along. This is indeed a lovely tract of country. In a short time we arrive at Oregon city, which is distant fifteen miles, and is picturesquely situated on the Willamette river, a tributary of the Columbia. To our right lies the city with mountains rising up right at the back of it, the river rushing through the centre with a beautiful waterfall in the shape of a horse shoe just at the outskirts. To our left the rich and luxuriant valley, one of the most productive in the states. We travel this, valley now passing extensive hop yards, nurseries and orchards, all in the highest state of cultivation. Hay almost ready for cutting and grain from a foot to a foot and a half high. You would think nature had lavished all the wealth of beauty in this valley. Fine stretches of timber land, one mass of green and white, as there is any quantity of mountain laurel and cuttle wood trees in full bloom. The latter is used extensively in ornamental work in furniture furnishings, better known in Ontario as the cyrnga tree. We thought we knew what it was for the fields and trees to be dressed in their green garb, but once we had entered this section of the country we came to the conclusion that Ontario people did not know what that color was like and had never seen green in the true sense of the word. Everything is rich and of a velvetysoftness in shade that could not be conceived without having been seen. I can scarcely give you any idea of the beauty and richness of this tract of country, but certainly might properly be termed the "Garden of Eden."

We pass over what is called the Eyrie's prairie in going from Oregon to Salem. This of course is still in the Willamette valley. It was first settled by the French who intermarried with the Indians, and now is settled by halfbreeds. They have fine homes and orchards and extensive farms, all well cultivated. About three miles out of Salem we come to a very pretty Indian village. The houses are all built by the Government, and have a fine high school or college. The Government force the half-breeds to educate their children. The fence in front of the college was lined with young Indians as we passed. A number of the teachers are from Canada who are engaged here. Salem, the capital, is the largest and wealthiest city in the state except Portland. It has over 10,000 inhabitants. Here we are shown the State house which is built of gray granite, also the asylum and penitentary, both fine buildings, and both containing over 300 inmates at the present time. It might be called the "city of trees." It has fine, wide, clean streets, and altogether is a handsome city. One cannot help noticing how clean and fresh looking all the towns and villages are that we pass through. We were sorry we could not travel this section of country by daylight, it is so interesting. However, by the time we arrive at Albany it is quite dark, and so we have to bid farewell to all sight seeing for that night. At Eugene city, where we arrive about 10 p.m., we say good bye to the last of our party from Ontario. Making ourselves comfortable for the night we know very little of what is going on around us until 6 a.m. the next morning. About 7 o'clock we arrive at Oakland where we stop 30 minutes for breakfast, and from here we telegraph to our friend to meet us next morning about the same time. From this out the scenery becomes interesting as we are nearing the Siskiyou mountains. These are a spur of the Sierra Nevadas. We are also entering the gold regions. The soil becomes quite red, and the rivers and streams of a deep orange color, caused, we are told, by the gold washing. About eleven o'clock we are well into the mountains, and the scenery now becomes wild and startling, the trestle work over some of the canyons being 156 feet high, and very frail looking structures. Yet the view from some of these was fine. The terrible gorge beneath us as well as to our right and left, and just beyond a lovely valley with a homestead almost at the mouth of the canyon. At Siskiyou station we reach the summit of the mountain, the elevation being 4,130 feet. Looking down from this height we see track below track beneath us, and are told that is where we have come from, the line winding like the letter S. From here we get a fine view of Mt. Shasta, 14,440 feet high. Its snow capped peak glistening in the sun appears to be about 10 miles away but is in reality 50 miles. Now we begin the descent of the mountain, winding and twisting around the it, shooting in and out of tunnels, crossing and recrossing canyons, thinking that we have gone a considerable distance, but find we have only been retracing our steps, and when we finally reach the bed of the Sacramento river we look up and find we are right under Siskiyou station which we thought we had left a long way behind us by this time. Some ladies standing at the top appear like children two years of age. We now run up the left bank of the river for a mile or so, cross over a long iron bridge and go down the opposite bank. Thus forming the letter U. About noon we cross the state line and enter California. All day long we run a race with the Sacramento river, which is one continuous cataract, dashing, boiling, roaring, foaming, on, on toward the ocean, into which it at last empties; here and there narrowing until you can almost touch its opposite bank, then widening until it forms a small lake. We shoot in and out of tunnels until we have passed through some twenty during the afternoon, some of them being so long that we had to have the lamps lighted while passing through them. We pass immense wood sheds built along the side of the track containing thousands of cords of wood. The forests here are fine and thickly wooded. The mode of getting the wood up from the valley to the top of the mountain is by packing horses. This is by tying a bundle of sticks on each side of the saddle or bare back and then climbing the hillside with it. Here again we see oxen in harness. After leaving Siskiyou we descend the mountain until the elevation is 2,154 feet, we again ascend so that when we arrive at Sissin we are 3,555 ft. After leaving this station a short distance, the whistle blows and we know something is wrong. On enquiring we find that cattle are on the track. Raising our window and looking out we see a fine animal lying on its back just under, with wheels passing over its head, having first been flung about 20 ft. into the air. This is the second time during our trip this has happened. When crossing the prairie in the N.W.T. a calf was killed. Then on nearing Portland horses were also struck on. The poor animals just escaped by leaping from the track. About 14 miles from Sissin we come to the upper soda springs, then three miles further the lower soda springs. These are natural springs of soda water rising out of the rock right on the edge of the river. Over the upper soda springs there is a fountain erected and a summer house built over it. Just accross from this on the other side of the river is a beautiful fall of water about fifty feet high, gushing out of the face of the cliff, with a rainbow stretching over it. The river is very narrow here so that you could easily toss a pebble into the waterfall. This is a most charming spot, and would make a delightful camping ground for any tourist. Our train stopped here for a short time to let us see it. The gentlemen got out to get a drink and secure some for the ladies, but were quite dissappointed to find the fountain dry as they were fixing the pipes. However, a gentleman secured a bottle at the lower springs and we had a drink. We have been passing through small villages all day, but just at dark we come to a fine town called Redding. Here most of our passengers leave us, as we have a troup of colored minstrels (colored when on the stage) on board all day, twenty-two in number. They were all fine intelligent looking men and women, and we thought it was a great pity they did not make better use of their talents. We have still another night's ride before us, but feel pleased to know our trip will be ended in the morning, although it has been pleasurable throughout, having had the most delightful weather all the way and nothing to mar our trip from beginning to end. We found it smooth travelling and had no trouble in any way whatever. Officials everywhere were gentlemanly and accommodating, and gave information willingly and gladly. No one need feel troubled at all about travelling alone. Friday morning about six o'clock we arrive at Benicia. Here our train is put on a ferry and taken across the Sacramento river, just at the mouth of San Francisco Bay, to Port Costa, a pretty little village nestling at the foot of the hill on the other side of the river. From this out we wind around the hills and along the edge of the bay until we arrive at Oaklands, a lovely town across the bay from San Francisco about eight miles, with a population of over 25,000. Here a friend meets us and we are taken to the wharf waiting at the end of the pier and a delightful sail across the bay reached the land of sunshine and flow-

MAUD ANNESLEY.

A TALE OF LOVE AND JEALOUSY AND A TERRIBLE TEMPTATION.

The close of a golden day at Sorrento.

Maud Annesley stood in the garden of Tasso's villa, which, as the traveller knows, is perched like a sea-bird on the summit of the tall cliffs and looked out across the sunlit waters to where Ischia showed beautiful and unreal, as a fairy barque moored on the shining waves.

A lovely girl, this Maud Annesley, with a face at once tender, sensitive and proud, with marvellous brown eyes and sunny-brown hair, with grace in every movement, with perfect hands and feet, and, in point of character, as capricious, spoiled and uncertain as her compatriots alone can be yet still remain bewitching. As full of good qualities as she was of faults, a bundle of inconsistencies so opposite that she sometimes herself said, laughingly, she wondered that she held together.

There she stood, leaning her arms on the railing and gazing down the dizzy height where the gulls circled to and fro, while she looked wistfully over at the purple island, and was haunted by a sudden, foolish fancy that it seemed like the land of the lotus-eaters, where she might sit down and rest forever, could she only reach its happy shore. She had been spending a gay day with a gay party. She had been the centre and chief attraction for all the men. She had been in the wildest spirits and was handsomer than ever. And now she stood there in the sunset and sighed and looked dreamy and pre-occupied, as if care and trouble had come to her at last.

Howard Crofton, grave and sedate as befitted his nine and twenty years, strolled idly out upon the villa terrace, and saw her standing there in the magic light, and called her hard names and himself a fool, which no doubt he was, so far as concerned her, sensible as he usually proved himself in other respects.

It was the second week in June. For a whole month Crofton had been living in a blessed dream; and now that it was rudely disturbed he felt himself an aggrieved individual, as, indeed, I think he had a right to think himself.

He had come to Sorrento, meaning to remain for a few days and then go back to Naples, and drift away northward: but he found Maud Annesley and a pleasant party, and here he was still. He had known Maud's aunt long before, when he was a mere boy, and she received him like an old friend, for his mother's sake; and, thus introduced, he and Maud had naturally glided into a rapid and agreeable intimacy. Censorious people called Maud's mildest manners with men flirting of an outrageous sort; but, she was gentler and less capricious with Crofton than her aunt had ever seen her with any man, but, like a wise woman, the elder lady held her peace.

Just a week before this day Crofton's cousin and her spouse appeared, a cousin like most people's given to interference and governing; and of all the girls that lived, Mrs. Grosvenor hated Maud Annesley the worst. She disliked girls in general as women often do who have been beauties and have since grown thin and skinny and yellow; but she detested Maud! They had met in Paris two years previous, and Maud had laughed at her airs and graces, and Mrs. Grosvenor had been obliged to play second to this brilliant creature, who seemed to fascinate men at will. So she took refuge in hating the girl, and perhaps found a kind of consolation therein.

Soon afterwards the San Arpinos came down from Naples and took possession of their villa; and, to the disgust of the stately old dowager, young San Arpino, the heir to a dukedom and a rent roll enormous for Italy, and one of the handsomest men the peninsula could boast, flung himself anew straight at Maud Annesley's heart, or head, or feet, as you please. He had done this the previous winter in Rome, much to the disgust of his stately mother, the Duchess. Maud had, it is true, been the most admired girl there. But she had not a large fortune, and, even if she had, the San Arpinos, for a wonder, would not have needed her wealth. They had enough of their own, and more. They were proud. They boasted two sustained titles, and a descent, which they traced back almost to Nero, or Romulus himself, for what I know.

From the moment that San Arpino appeared Maud Annesley had completely changed in her conduct towards Crofton. There had been no letting him down easily; no attempt at pretence. She turned haughty and insolent and stony, and was never so charming and womanly to San Arpino as when Crofton was by to see. And this was the creature whom he had loved, had believed in; before whom he had poured his heart and soul, and let her know that he had done so! He had never put his secret into words, but he knew that she had seen it clearly enough, and had given him the tacit encouragement which any woman can do when she pleases, and yet remain perfectly feminine and delicate. False and despicable she proved in every way, and he had loved her! He loved her still, in spite of his pain and wrath. He learned the whole truth from his cousin, heard the story of the past winter, heard of San Arpino's devotion. Maud's efforts to win a ducal coronet and the old dowager's rage and masterly diplomacy to prevent such a consummation. He, Crofton, had been flirted with from sheer wantonness, or else regarded as a pis aller. Maud afterwards had thought of liking him and his fortune, because she believed the young Duke out of her reach. But the instant the Neapolitan reappeared and proved that his devotion was as strong as ever, strong enough to make him rebel against the mother who had always ruled him imperiously, then Maud flung off the mask and let Crofton see her in her true colors.

He was going on the morrow. The torture of the last five days had grown insupportable. Besides, now there was no longer any doubt in his mind, it would be weak and contemptible to remain, a laughing-stock for all about—and worse, an object of scorn to himself.

He had been horribly treated, and his sense of justice revolted against this. He was a man slow to anger, but he was furious now. Had the girl shown the least consideration for his feelings he could have made excuses for her. He knew she did not love this handsome boy, who was only her own age; but she might be dazzled by his position, she might be urged on by her aunt. Crofton could have sought for reasons why he should not judge her harshly had her conduct afforded the least opportunity. But she turned upon him with absolute cruelty; she seemed to have a savage pleasure in rendering the blow as cruel as possible, in hurting him in every way that female ingenuity can contrive.

To-day they had all been on an excursion, up among the lovely Sorrento hills. Crofton could not remain behind, for fear this girl should think he lacked courage to support her heartless cruelty, and she had made such a day for him that he thought a soul in purgatory might pity him.

So now he was going away. As he stood on the terrace and he caught sight of her standing below him, in her matchless beauty, a wild desire crossed his mind to speak, to let all his misery and anger find vent. She deserved it, deserved to hear the verdict of a true, upright heart, which her treachery had lacerated. He did not stop to consider. He was too nearly mad to be hindered by scruples or ideas which would have influenced him at another time.

He strode down the steps, hurried through the garden, and came upon her before she was aware of his presence. The least addition of color rushed into her cheeks, a second's confusion into her eyes, as she turned and perceived him. But both signs disappeared so quickly that he almost fancied they had not been there. She looked a little wearied, bored by this intrusion, but she gave him a sweet smile more cruel than a dagger thrust, and said, indolently, "How can you have energy enough left, after the day's fatigues, to move when you might sit still?"

"You seem to share a portion of it," he answered, trying to imitate her indifference.

"Oh, I came out to get rid of the people," she replied. "One might as well be an animal in a menagerie, one never gets a moment to oneself."

"Probably I disturb you then," said he.

"I am too well brought up a young person to contradict my elders," she replied, laughingly.

"Still, truth now and then makes an agreeable variety in this world, even if not polite," he retorted, losing his ill-assumed indifference.

"I think you are misanthropical or cross," said she. "I dislike either mood, so I will leave you."

He stood straight in her path, and fixed his eyes on her with a look of such iron determination that she remained motionless.

"It is possible that what I have to say may not be agreeable," returned he, slowly; "but I mean to say it, all the same. I am going away to-morrow"——

"Does that come under the head of disagreeable truths?" she interrupted, with a little shrug of her shoulders.

"Not to you, certainly, or to me," he answered.

"So much the better; then bon voyage!"

"But, before I go, there is something I wish to say"——

"Last words are so fatiguing," she murmured. "I beg your pardon; but you spoke just as the dying people in novels begin their confessions. I forgot it was only a journey you were looking forward to."

"If I were dying" he cried out passionately, "you and I could not be separating more irrevocably."

"Partings are hard things," sighed she. "There's only one thing worse as a rule—meeting people again."

"I wonder," he exclaimed, smiting his hands together in uncontrollable excitement, "oh, I do wonder if you are a living, flesh and blood woman, or one of those snow creatures, animated by a spell, such as the old legends tell of!"

"Why, that's really very pretty!" she said, in the tone of one who is receiving a compliment, and feels surprised that the speaker had tact to offer it. "I see you are determined to make me regret your departure."

Nothing but a woman, and a woman of society, could have been so perfectly well bred and yet so horribly ironical and insolent.

"I have been here a whole month," he continued, not noticing her words.

She took advantage of the slight pause he made, for he found it difficult to speak calmly, to add: "Yes, a whole month!" and her voice implied that the period had seemed very long indeed.

Again he went on, without heeding her cruel mockery.

"From the first time we met I made no effort to hide my feelings. I could not have done so if I would. I loved you, Maud Annesley, and you knew it."

He was not looking at her now. He had turned partly away and was staring out across the sunlit sea. Had he seen her face he must have noticed how it changed suddenly. But fate was against them both and he saw nothing.

"You know," he hurried on, "that my devotion was not the idle homage a man pays a beautiful woman. You knew that my whole heart had gone out towards you, and tacitly you accepted it. You did a very wicked thing! I have no hesitation in acknowledging my weakness. I honor myself that I could love any human being as truly and unselfishly as I did you. That I was deceived is no shame to me."

The pallor and softness left her face. The beautiful features looked hard, as if carved out of marble.

"Don't stop!" she cried. "You had more to say—finish it!"

"Only to compliment you on your skill and art! It amused you to attempt a sort of Lady Clara Vere de Vere play with an honest heart! You succeeded perfectly. If that knowledge be any triumph to you, take it."

"Is it worth while?" she retorted, as if considering whether to accept success which was of such slight value.

"You do not deny the truth of what I have said. You cannot!" he exclaimed.

"In any case, I would not," she cried; and now she confronted him with a face shaken by anger. "If one word would clear me in your estimation, I'd not speak it. No, not if my soul's safety depended on its utterance. Believe what you will. It is a matter of indifference to me! Your respect would not be worth the having. You have been rude—insolent. I will never forgive you! Never!"

"It is a little odd to hear you put the right to pardon on your side," he answered, trying to speak calmly, since she had flamed into such passionate wrath. "To deny would be so useless that it is wise not to make the attempt."

"Go on! Do go on! I want to hear you speak your whole mind out. I would not stop you for the world," she said, with a bitter laugh.

"I have nothing more to say. I will congratulate you, if you like, on winning a coronet. It is the true English girl's ambition!" he sneered.

"He knows us so well!" she cried, laughing again in the same low, mirthless fashion.

"Did you love him I could excuse your treatment of me. Love is always an excuse. But you do not. You love nobody but yourself. If any higher rank were within your reach, you would fling this boy aside as unhesitatingly as you have flung me.'

"Yes. I love nobody but myself," she exclaimed. "You are right there!"

"And boast of it?"

"Yes."

She turned and walked away without another word. He made no attempt to follow—why should he? They had nothing more to say to one another in this world. He had only one prayer to offer, where she was concerned—it was that even in the next he might be preserved from the sight of her.

He waited till she had crossed the terrace, and disappeared into the house; then he hurried off through the lane-like streets, past the little square, where the villagers were collected, as usual, at that hour, and so up the path which runs along the ravine towards the hills above. The sun set in a blaze of glory. The sea shone like the pavement of the city the Prophet saw in his vision. It deepened from opal tints to amethyst, then grew dark and mysterious. The moon came up and trailed a pathway of golden light across the billows which seemed to lead away into heaven. The hills loomed shadowy and black. The pale glory of the evening sky domed in the whole. The soft murmurs of the brook sounded through the stillness, as if calling to the sea; and the sea answered, as if to welcome it in its course. A single nightingale awoke in the orange grove, and sang his heart out in a passionate plaint. The faint breeze brought, ever anon, the sound of laughing voices from the old square, where the villagers still gossiped. All was quiet and peaceful, save in his heart, where the tempest raged with awful might.

It was late when Crofton returned to the Tasso, but he was not able to get up to his rooms in safety. There were laughter and music in the salons and gay groups standing about the long corridors. Of course, he was captured, and forced to talk and laugh and behave like ordinary mortals under the galling restraints of civilization.

Crofton had told his old owl of a cousin of his proposed departure. He was glad to escape her society, for he had grown almost of late to detest her, with her head-shakings, her Cassandra prophecies, and now her "I told you so's," expressed in words and looks. Naturally, by the time he reached the house, everybody knew he intended to go away, and they were all eager to detain him. A portion of the party was to set off in the morning on an expedition to Amalfi. The others were going to row over to Capri and spend the day there. Crofton could not escape staying for one excursion or the other, for he was still animated by the natural desire to keep his hurt a secret. He chose Capri, however, when he heard that Maud Annesley was to make one of the Amalfi party.

While all the talk and merriment went on he could see this Maud Annesley through the open windows. She stood out on the terrace, with the full moonlight glorifying her face, as she talked and listened to young San Arpino, who had escaped from his dowager mother, and came to the hotel as usual.

Down in the gardens below, an Italian boy began playing Neapolitan sea-songs on his guitar. Half a dozen people called at once upon Maud to sing. Without hesitation she complied, and her rich contralto voice floated into the rooms, unearthly in its sweetness, and shook Crofton's very soul. He could stand it no more; so he cast one other look out into the glory of the night, and saw her standing there in her beauty, while the young Italian Duke gazed into her face with a passionate devotion he made no effort to conceal. Then Crofton passed from the rooms, hoping that he had bidden Maud Annesley farewell forever.

The night he spent was tragic enough. But in this prosaic world tragedies more frequently meet with an anti-climax than a consummation, and Crofton's experience was the usual one.

He was late in appearing the next morning, rather hoping that the pleasure seekers might have forgot him and gone off. But when one wants forgetfulness people always remember one. Up came a servant to say that everybody had gone down to the shore, but he was waited for there, and must come.

So off he set, cursing acquaintances and expeditions in his heart, as all of us have so often done when wearied and wounded, and yet forced to meet the petty exigencies of life with a smiling front. His cousin, Mrs. Grosvenor, had sent him word that she was too miserable with her neuralgia to join the party. There was a slight consolation in that. He should at least be free from her questions and surmises, her sighs and corkscrew glances, always trying to worm his secret out of him, she being one of those people who enjoyed groaning over the misfortunes of the persons she liked.

Crofton reached the shelving shore that spreads below the rocky descent from the village. Two boats, with bright-colored awnings, were ready. Into the smaller of the two San Arpino was assisting Maud Annesley just as Crofton appeared. In his dizziness and the uncertain state of his faculties on the previous evening, he had misunderstood, and so had chosen the very expedition of which she was to make a member.

Most of the wild young ones had gone to Amalfi. The boat in which Crofton seated himself held staid elders. Maud's aunt among them, with whom Crofton was a favorite. But she looked grave and rather harassed this morning, and was less cordial to him than her wont. The boat in which Miss Annesley and San Arpino, with a few other youthful people were seated, took the lead; and as he sat in the bow, Crofton could hear her gay laugh ring out across the waters, but he did not once turn his head. She had seen him as he descended the shore; their eyes had met. Then she had turned quickly away. Some words from the aunt made Crofton comprehend that neither she nor Maud had understood he was to make one of the party.

Beautiful rock-bound Capri! How one would like to dwell on its loveliness and its marvels! But you shall go visit these wonders, or read of them in faithful memory, since I have not leisure to dwell thereon.

It was late in the afternoon. Unwearied by the exertion of the morning the whole party listened approvingly to somebody's proposal that they should climb the cliff which rose in front of them, as they all sat comfortably resting in the broad veranda of the Quissisana Hotel, which looks out across the Salerno Bay.

On foot, or on donkeys, as each person pleased, away they defiled, up the narrow road, winding in and out among little villas, cosy peasants' cots, vine-wreathed walls, but always mounting up and up, the view widening and beautifying with every step. At last the road became a mere path; but by this time nobody thought of the way, in the delight of watching the grand panorama spread out below.

They were now not far from the top. Here it was necessary to dismount and look over the famous abyss down which the Emperor Tiberius had a playful habit of flinging his guests when he wearied of their society or craved a little excitement. It was a bald, bare precipice, good 700 feet in height, down which they fell into the white breakers of the ever-restless sea. Here some adventurous Capriot, lately returned from England, had established a little refreshment place, and, as most of the party were English, it was necessary to patronize the smiling wretch and let him prove by the exorbitancy of his charges that he had profited by his stay in the land of the free.

Crofton wandered off, turned an angle of the path where a great rock shut out the house and the gay party, and toiled on up to the top, where, among the ruins, rises a small chapel, in which a make-believe hermit lives and wheedles centesimi out of the pockets of stray visitors. But just now the hermit was down at the restaurant drinking surreptitious glasses of red wine in the kitchen; so Crofton was left to gaze and marvel undisturbed.

Presently the sound of voices roused them. He heard Maud Annesley's merry laugh, and turning, found himself face to face with her and San Arpino.

Maud and Crofton had managed to pass the day without exchanging a word. She had appeared as oblivious of his contiguity as only a woman can. But now, at sight of him, she said gayly, "So you had stolen a march on us after all, Mr. Crofton. I thought we were the first up."

"Where are the others?" he asked, since it was necessary to speak.

"Oh, drinking sour wine and listening to our naturalized compatriot's enormous fibs," she answered.

San Arpino spoke pleasantly to Crofton in his quaint, broken English. He was always civil, even cordial, and apparently perfectly unconscious that his attempts at friendship were neither desired nor welcome, though indeed Crofton was too just a man to visit Miss Annesley's sins upon a rival.

At this place the descent on the Salerno side was rocky, but little less steep than at the point called Tiberius' Leap; but the descent did not, as these, commence from the top. A steep path led down some twenty feet to a little platform of rock, whereon grew a crooked fir tree; from thence a sheer wall of cliff plunged perpendicularly to the sea.

After a brief conversation, Crofton walked away to the opposite side of the summit, to survey the ruins, leaving the young pair to themselves. Maud Annesley was in a mood when some wild, reckless performance possessed an irresistible attraction to her. She and San Arpino stood looking down at the stunted pine that clung to the platform of rock, and swung its ragged branches about, as if imploring to be released from its perilous position.

"I want to go down there," Maud said. "I am sure nothing but a mountain goat has ever stood under that tree. I want my name cut on the trunk."

San Arpino was as young and reckless as herself. He offered no opposition—rather admiring her courage, indeed. Though difficult, however, the path seemed to present no real danger if care were exercised.

A few minutes later, Howard Crofton, standing on the opposite side of the cliff, which looked out seaward, was roused from his gloomy meditations by a cry so wild and agonized that for years after it used to haunt his dreams. It was Maud Annesley's voice again; but so changed, so sharp with agony, so mad with fear, that for an instant it rooted him to the spot where he stood. Then away he rushed across the summit, gained the other side, and looked over. Maud Annesley was clinging to the fragments of rock, half way down to the platform, and trying to disengage her dress from a trailing vine which held her fast. She was in safety. He saw that. But he saw, too, the prostrate form of the young Italian, sliding helplessly and slowly towards the narrow platform of rock from whence the precipice began.

San Arpino had stepped a little out of the path, the better to aid Maud, had slipped and had struck his head so violently against a projecting stone that it knocked him almost senseless. He was slipping down now—down, down, Maud unable to extricate herself so as to rush to his aid.

Crofton saw it all, in the brief second he stood motionless, and a hundred years seemed to pass in that whirling space. With each new slide the body would go faster—faster! When it reached the platform the impetus would be so great that even had San Arpino consciousness left he could not save himself! He would be carried straight over the edge into the awful abyss.

And Howard Crofton saw this, and during that instant, which seemed an eternity, a score of devils tugged at his heart and whispered awful suggestions in his ear. Let him go! Let this false woman crouch there and see him perish, they said; see her ambitious hopes, to gain which she had so recklessly marched over a human heart, smitten from her, just when they seemed secure of fruition! This was what the demons urged upon Howard Crofton's soul, and I should lie if I denied that he hesitated. He did hesitate. The temptation was almost irresistible in its strength. Always he was gazing down. He could see Maud Annesley's white face, her frantic efforts to free herself, the helpless body sliding on—on!

But after one moment of hesitation and with a cry almost as mad as that shriek which had roused him to a consciousness of what was passing, Crofton turned and dashed down the descent. He saw while running all the while that by taking a more circuitous path, one a little further on, he could reach the platform before San Arpino. The one hope was to seize him there.

Away he ran.

At the sound of his voice Maud Annesley raised her head, comprehended that help was at hand and sank back on the moss and fainted away.

On Crofton dashed—on—on!

Vines trailed about his feet and almost threw him down. Stones, dislodged by his careless steps, nearly crushed his feet. He fell—was up again dashing on—on!

Always he could see that prostrate body sliding down—down! It was going faster now! Oh, he should be too late, and this man's death would lie at his door! He had hesitated, and now he should have this awful crime upon his soul through all eternity!

On, on! The way seemed endless. The pine tree shook its deformed arms. The wind surged suddenly up with a moaning cry. The voice of the sea responded in a hoarse shout of triumph, as if exulting over its prey. The dazzling sweep of sunlight on the white rock blinded him. But he could always see that form sliding down—down, each half second an age, each step in that frantic race he ran against death, as difficult as some mad flight the soul takes through the horrors of a nightmare.

Steeper became the inclined plane. It was now slippery with moss, over which the body sped, faster still, lifted almost from the ground twice, and flung on—on! Another bound, a wilder rush and Crofton had reached the tree, and flung one arm about the trunk, to steady himself, and with the other hand and his feet struck at the body as it neared him, seized an arm helplessly extended, planted his feet on the trailing coat and—had saved his rival.

When Maud Annesley came to her senses she was half lying on a stone bench at the side of a little chapel. Further on she saw San Arpino, supported in the hermit's arms, while Howard Crofton bathed his forehead and employed such means as were at hand to restore him to consciousness.

The hermit had returned just as Crofton caught San Arpino in that frantic clutch. Between them the two had carried the insensible man up the rocks, and then returned to place Maud Annesley beyond the reach of danger.

The unconscious party below were still resting at the little house near the Leap. Now and then the wind brought up the murmur of their voices and laughter.

Maud raised herself. She was weak and tottering. But she managed to reach the spot where the two men were at work over the senseless form.

The first sign Crofton had of her presence was when her voice, close to his side, whispered dismally, "Is he dead? Have I killed him?"

Crofton turned. A bitter response rose to his lips, but the sight of her white face checked it.

"There is nothing wrong but a few bruises and a broken arm," he said. "He will come to himself presently."

So he did. He was a little wild and incoherent in his talk at first, but he was soon able to recall what had happened, to smile at Maud and to mutter a few broken words of thankfulness to Crofton.

After a while the loiterers below were summoned. Crofton quickly silenced their eager questions and useless terror. San Arpino pronounced himself well enough to be put on a donkey so as to make the descent of the mountain, and Crofton walked by his side, and supported him in the saddle. Fortunately, when they reached the village, the English surgeon from Ana Capri was there. San Arpino's broken arm was set, and his wounds dressed. It was better that he should not run the risk of returning to Sorrento. By good luck his mother had gone up to Naples for a few days, so that the accident could be kept from her.

"Will you stay with me to-night?" San Aprino asked of Crofton. "They'll send my man and my valise over by the boat, but I wish you'd stay."

Of course, no refusal was possible. Crofton was occupied in the wounded man's chamber when the party sailed. The moon had risen before he quitted it. San Arpino was very comfortable and had fallen asleep. Crofton left the surgeon sitting by him and went out on the terrace. He came face to face with Maud Annesley.

"Miss Annesley!" he exclaimed. "I thought you had been gone for hours."

"Oh," she cried bitterly, lifting her pale face. "I may not be human, but I am not quite a fiend. Did you think I could leave this man, whom my wicked recklessness had led almost to death?"

After all it was only natural that she should remain, Crofton said to himself, for she was to marry the young fellow.

"He is asleep, they told me," she said, presently.

"Yes, everything is going well."

"I know—Dr. Green told me." She stopped for an instant, then exclaimed wildly: "Oh, Mr. Crofton, if heaven had not sent you there! Let me thank you—do let me!"

"There is no necessity," he replied, coldly. "I have no right to thanks, either."

"You"——

"Wait. Let me finish. Miss Annesley, when I saw that man sliding down, down to death, my first impulse was to let him go—to let him die before your eyes! I was almost a murderer, you perceive."

She covered her face with her hands and sat silent.

"I need not have told you this," he went on. "But it is better. Perhaps it may serve as a warning to you, not to use your beauty and your fascinations to break another man's heart, as you did mine."

She looked up now. But he continued resolutely.

"Shall I tell you what stopped me?—what made the temptation powerless when it was at its height?"

"Oh, tell me," she said, with a ghost of a laugh. "You can say nothing worse of me than you have done. Go on."

"Because to-day" (his voice shook slightly now), "to-day I became convinced that, in one respect, I had wronged you. You do love that man."

She turned her face quickly away. He saw her bosom heave, her breath come and go.

"I told you yesterday that love was always an excuse," pursued Crofton. "By great mercy, I read the truth this day.

A Fantasy.

What is a girl's life, pray?
  A little garden space
Within whose every spring
  She sees her beauteous face;
Where she is sole possessor
  Of all she hears and sees,
From the fluting of birds in summer
  To the honey of the bees;
Rosy wreaths and strings of pearl
All belong to the happy girl.

And what is a boy's life, pray?
  A quiet, shady nook,
Where he has nothing to do but play,
  Nor ever read a book;
A kingdom of contentment,
  Which every hour discloses
Some new delight of sense and sight,
  Fresh growth of sweeter roses;
A rich inheritance of joy
That crowns with light the happy boy.

We might be more than happy
  And lead such perfect lives
If all of us were children
  And none were husbands, wives;
But boys grow and girls grow,
  Together or apart,
Till some day each discovers
  The other has a heart.
This halves their joys and doubles their cares
And ends in wrinkles and gray hairs;
  In the feet that rock the cradle,
    In the hands that toil for bread,
  The trouble about the living,
    The sorrow above the dead.

What can we do, then? Nothing more
  Than those who begot and bore us;
  They make our lives before us
As theirs were made before.
We must be up and doing,
Maidens flying and men pursuing;
Then hey! for billing and cooing,
And ho! for wooing and wiuning.
  The world will never mend,
Love was before the beginning,
  And will be after the end.

Past Her Usefulness.

BY ANNA D. WALKER.

Past her usefulness, no, ah, no;
Dear grandma, with her locks of snow,
Her placid face, her loving tone.
How sorrowful, how lost and lone,
We'd be without that presence dear,
Who tries to comfort and to cheer
In every dark and gloomy hour,
Her loving heart it gives the power.

Past her usefulness, no, ah, no;
Each kindly smile she doth bestow
Will help to cheer us on our way,
Like sunshine on a darksome day.
Each time we note that furrowed brow,
That frame which age has bid to bow,
Her head so white with winter's snow,
We feel new love within us glow.

Past her usefulness, no, ah, no,
We would not dare to say 'twas so.
Our hearts might grow all hard and sere
Were it quite empty, grandma's chair.
We think upon her feet all worn,
With journey full of steep and thorn,
We view her pale and wrinkled hand
And touched to tenderness we stand.

Past her usefulness, no, ah, no,
She rocks the cradle to and fro,
Dear grandma faithful watches keeps
While baby on the pillow sleeps.
Winter and spring, we softly say,
Eveningtide and dawn of day,
Baby a bud of promise sweet,
Grandma the head of ripen'd wheat.

Past her usefulness, no, ah, no,
We're sure it never can be so,
We clasp her in a warm embrace,
We print a kiss upon her face,
We think on all that she has done,
We view the victory nearly won,
And softly cry, we cannot bear
To have it empty, grandma's chair!

A Shattered Illusion.

  know not if 'twere chance or fate
That brought the maid and me together;
At table d'hote one night at eight
  Our talk began about the weather.
We had no introduction—no,
  But this displays no lack of breeding,
Our seats were next each other, so
  It was a natural proceeding.

She dressed in stunning English style,
  Her hair was neatly coiled and braided.
"Ah! blessed," I thought, "is Britain's isle
  If home for eyes so softly shaded!"
Our rambling chat that waxed apace
  Was interspersed with frequent "fahncys."
I'll not deny the "fe'ching" grace
  Of "reahlly" slipped betwixt her glances.

Still something nameless made me doubt
  Her being truly, bluely Briton,
Yet when one little phrase slipped out,
  With horror was my bosom smitten.
"I guess"—She could not call it back,
  And laughed to hide her sweet confusion.
Oh, lovely Anglomaniac,
  To shatter thus my fond illusion!

Ye Cannibal and Ye Missionaree.

A cannibal lived on a cannibal isle,
  And was thinner than thin could be;
His legs were as lean as the tail of a rat,
His head rattled round in his number-five hat,
And he left no mark on the sand where he sat,
  Oh, a woful sight was he!
    So he was—
  A dismal sight was he.

Now, there came to this island from over the main
  A laudable missionaree;
His weight was three hundred and forty-three pound,
His paunch and his jowls and his tonsure were round,
And he left a mark when he sat on the ground
  Just two-and-a-half feet by three.
    So he did—
  Just two-and-a-half feet by three.

But the moral I'm trying to teach in my song
  You soon will be able to see,
For the Christian proved docile and teachable quite;
He learnt from the heathen the thing that was right,
And one Sunday morning, as soon as 'twas light
  He ate up the cannibalee!
    Yes, he did—
  He ate up the cannibalee.

Oh, the Wretch.

"My darling, you do not bestow upon me so much affection as you did before we were married," remarked a pouting bride of four years to her husband. "Don't I?" he replied. "No, Charles, you do not; you pay very little attention to me." "Well, my dear," observed the wicked husband, "did you ever see a man run after a street car after he had caught it?"

Suited to the Occasion.

At the barracks.

"How goes it, sergeant?"

"Pretty well, Major, only I'm hungry as a horse."

"Orderly, have a bale of hay sent around Sergt. Brown's quarters."

A fox at Horbling, in Lancashire, England, was compelled to retreat from her earth, owing to its flooding by heavy thunder-rain. She proceeded to bring her cubs out one by one into a field, where she was observed by two men. Then finding that escape with the four was impossible, she deliberately attacked her own cubs and killed them one after the other, after which she hastily scampered to a neighboring covert.

DUE TO SPONTANEOUS COMBUSTION.

An English Physician Reports a Death From this Cause.

A phenomenal occurrence, nothing less than the spontaneous combustion of the human body, is claimed to have taken place recently. Dr. Booth reports the case as follows in the British Medical Journal:

On the morning of Sunday, February 19th, I was sent for to examine the remains of a man, age 65, a pensioner of notoriously intemperate habits. I found the charred remains of the man reclining against the stone wall of the hay loft. The main effects of combustion were limited to the corpse, and only a small piece of the adjacent flooring and the woodwork immediately above the man's head had suffered. The body was almost a cinder, yet retained the form of the face and figure so well that those who had known him in life could readily recognize him. Both hands and the right foot had been burnt off, and had fallen through the floor into the stable below among the ashes, and the charred and calcined ends of the right radius and ulna, the left humerus and the right tibia and fibula were exposed to view. The hair and scalp were burnt off the forehead, exposing the bare and calcined skull. The tissues of the face were represented by a greasy cinder, retaining the cast of the features, and the incinerated mustache still gave the wonted military expression to the old soldier The soft tissues were almost entirely consumed. On my return from other work, later on, I found that the whole had been removed. The bearers told me that the whole body had collapsed when they had tried to move it en masse. From the comfortable recumbent attitude of the body, it was evident that there had been no death struggle, and that, stupefied with all the whisky within and smoke without, the man had expired without suffering, the body burning away quietly all the time.

Children's Luncheons on Excursion.

I offer the experience of one family hoping it may be of use. Our children had not lived many years before we were convinced that grown people cannot judge of the appetite of the young, so we resolved that they should never be denied food when they asked for it, and concluded that good brown bread was least likely to hurt them. I do not think we should have allowed a child to eat all the time, but we were never troubled in this way. When the children were young we had a large three-seated "carry-all," into which we used to pack and drive to woods or streams within ten miles, and spend as many hours as they were interested and happy. A can of milk, dry bread and fruit was the only lunch they ever had or wanted. Visitors who sometimes went with us used to think it rather unkind treatment, till they saw with what hearty appetites the bread was eaten and realized how harmless bread crumbs are. One afternoon their father took two of them, about 6 and 8 years of age, to another part of the country, and, returning, had to wait a few minutes at the Broad street station. The children complained of hunger and were taken into a restaurant, where the waiter vied with their father in offering tempting cakes. In vain, nothing suited; till, somewhat out of patience, their father asked, "Well, what do you want?" "A piece of bread," was the meek reply, and the waiter had a very disgusted expression as each child turned away with a half loaf of bread and a contented face. Even small children can be taught that eating in public is scarcely permissible, but plain bread, properly eaten, annoys others as little as anything can. Would it not be a good idea for grown people, too, to look upon their picnics and days of "outing" as opportunities to enjoy the country, to get exercise and fresh air and to be satisfied with bread?—Isabella in Philadelphia Ledger.

Drawing the Credit Line.

Merchant Tailor.—I am sorry to say it, Mr. Goodheart, but as this is to be your wedding-suit, I must demand cash on delivery.

Mr. Goodheart.—Eh? Why, I've had had an account with you for years, and I've always paid promptly to the hour, the very hour, sir.

"Yes, Mr. Goodheart, but you were a bachelor and had the handling of your own money."

A Poser.

The modern child is an analyst. The small kid was playing with the scissors and his kindly old grandmother chided him.

"You mustn't play with the scissors, dear. I knew a little boy just like you who was playing with a pair of scissors just like that pair, and he put them in his eye, and he put his eye out, and he never could see anything ever after."

The child listened patiently and said when she got through:

"What was the matter with his other eye?"

An Unpromising Match.

Mrs. Henpeck—My dear, you will make a sad mistake if you marry Mr. Meak. He has no beard, and he wears a wig.

Daughter—What difference does that make?

Huh! You try managing a husband with no hair of his own, and you'll find out."

A Pardonable Sin.

Editor's Wife—I wonder what can be the matter with Mrs. Smith; she hasn't returned my visit yet.

Editor (absent-mindedly)—Perhaps you neglected to enclose a stamp.

Sick dude—Oh, doctor, what ails me? Doctor—I am surprised to find that you have brain fever.

—Mathematics has its oddities. The multiplication of 987,654,321 by 45 gives 44,444,444,445. Reversing the order and multiplying 123,456,789 by 45 a result equally odd is obtained—5,555,555,505. Is that curious or isn't it? And there is plenty more where that came from.

About a year ago the Dakota farmers began to import cats to destroy the mice in the wheat fields. Now they have got all the cats they want, and are howling for bootjacks.

HOW HE GOT HIS WIFE.

A Novel Courtship Ends in a Happy Marriage.

It is not often in this generation of self-reliant and independent young men, that the son will allow the father either to choose or pay much attention to his own choice of a young lady for matrimonial purposes. But Mr. Edy S. Haviland, of Boston, Ont., had faith in his father's excellent judgment, and will now pin that faith tighter than ever upon this pater, for he has recently married the girl of his father's choice and thinks he could not have done half so well for himself. It appears that some time since, Willis Haviland (the father), who is a member of the religious sect called Plymouth Brethren, was on Manitoulin Island preaching, and while at Manitowaning met a Miss Maggie Elliott, young, amiable and good looking. He fancied her for a daughter-in-law and in a short time had his son in correspondence with her. Acquaintance ripened into some sort of a tender affection, and an engagement and wedding followed. The young man, who is but 22 years of age, had never seen his betrothed, but he went for her about the first of this month, married her and brought her to his home in Boston about a week ago.

The reception was pleasant to all concerned and the newly married couple had several incidents of their trip to relate that were amusing. The difficulty in procuring a marriage certificate was their first trouble, but that was overshadowed by the exchange of Mrs. Haviland's trunk, containing besides clothing, the certificate duly signed, sealed and delivered. She has a trunk full of gentleman's apparel that she would like to exchange for her own. The young people received a large number of lovely presents, and the bride has already found that there are warm hearts in Boston open to her. May their lives be long, happy and prosperous!—Brantford Expositor.

CLEANING CLOTHES.

How to Restore the Freshness of Worn Clothing and Make it Like New.

It is a mystery to many people how the scourers of old clothes can make them almost as good as new. Take, for instance, a shiny old coat, vest or pair of pants of broadcloth, cassimere or diagonal. The scourer makes a strong, warm soapsuds, and plunges the garment into it, souces it up and down, rubs the dirty places, if necessary puts it through a second suds, then rinses through several waters, and hangs it to dry on the line. When nearly dry, he takes it in, rolls it up for an hour or two, and then presses it. An old cotton cloth is laid on the outside of the coat, and the iron passed over that until the wrinkles are out; but the iron is removed before the steam ceases to rise from the goods, else they would be shiny. Wrinkles that are obstinate are removed by laying a wet cloth over them, and passing the iron over that. If any shiny places are seen, they are treated as the wrinkles are; the iron is lifted, while the full cloud of steam arises, and brings the nap up with it. Cloth should always have suds made specially for it, as if that which has been used for white cotton or woolen clothes, lint will be left in the water, and cling to the cloth. In this manner we have known the same coat and pantaloons to be renewed time and again, and have all the look and feel of new garments. Good broadcloth and its fellow cloths will bear many washings, and look better every time because of them.—American Analyst.

The Idol of the Town.

The most popular song in England just now is monopolized by the London idol, Miss Vesta Tilley, and is entitled "Bachelors." Miss Tilley is a drawing favorite both for herself and her manager. For him she draws all the dudes of the metropolis to spend their money in the music hall, and for herself she draws $200 to $250 per week. The song runs as follows:

I want a girl of flesh, not stone,
  Chorus—So do I!)
Whose heart will beat for me alone;
  (Chorus—Oh, what joy!)
A tender, pure, impulsive maid;
  (Chorus—Hard to find!)
A comforter when sorrow comes;
  (Chorus—Brave and kind!)
A John Bull's daughter like her dad;
  (Chorus—Good and true!)
Until I find one I shall search England through.
  Chorus—And I'll not go away to Yankeeland
    To seek out there a lady's heart and hand!
    An English girl, if win her love you can,
    Is good enough for any Englishman.

Another chorus to this song touches rather heavily upon the matrimonial combination of Prince Henry of Battenberg and Princess Beatrice:

Had I been born a handsome German Prince,
I might have been a son-in-law long since;
The royal maid of thirty-six I'd splice,
By doing it for half Prince Henry's price.

Bobby's Disappointment.

Bobby has been playing on the porch while his mother was calling within. She suddenly appears at door with hostess ready to take her leave, when Bobby bursts into tears and cries:

"Mamma, ain't you going to stay to lunch?"

"No, dear."

"Boo—hoo—hoo—well, you said you would—boo—hoo—hoo."

(Painful silence, followed by rapid leave-taking.)

Duty.

Mrs. De Style—Were you at church last Sunday? I didn't see you.

Mrs. De Fashion—I saw you.

"Did you? How did you like my new bonnet?"

"Oh, it was perfectly lovely! It came from Paris, I'm sure."

"Yes, my dear friend. Mrs. Devout smuggled it in for me."—New York Weekly.

It was recently discovered that a plot was being concerted among the convicts in Kingston Penitentiary to revolt and gain their liberty, and on Saturday by the advice of Sir John Thompson a number of soldiers were placed in hiding with a view to contingencies. The fact that the plot was known, however, in some way got to the ears of the malcontents, and the expected denouement did not take place.

Two girls, aged 17 and 19 respectively, arrived at Buffalo on Saturday from Johnstown, where they had been deprived of friends and food by the terrible flood. They were penniless and desirous of proceeding to Almonte, Ont., where they had friends who would care for them. The flood sufferers' fund at Buffalo not being available for that purpose, State Officer Winspeare sent them on at the expense of the State.

At an Imperial Federation League meeting in London on Saturday night, Sir Charles Tupper, after admitting that the federation idea was now received in Canada with as much enthusiasm as in some other colonies, suggested the holding of a convention, representing all parts of the Empire, to consider the question of federation in all its bearings. He urged that one result might possibly be the adoption of an Imperial fiscal policy beneficial to the Empire as a whole. Lord Herschell, the Chairman, in the course of his speech, remarked that, if such a convention be held, it must be at the desire of the colonies. Mr. Rankin, member of Parliament for Leominster, afterwards urged Canada to take the lead in pressing for a convention such as suggested by Sir Charles Tupper.

Word has reached Montreal of a terrible drowning accident that took place some days ago on the River Rouge, at the joint log drive of the Ottawa Lumber Company and Hon. J. K. Ward. In order to save portaging, a foreman named Emery Cote and two young men—one a French-Canadian, Monte Bello, and the other an Indian named Barnaby Shawen, tried to descend the mountain rapids in their canoe. The craft, which was rather heavily laden with utensils, provisions, etc., ran on a rock and was smashed to pieces. Cote got ashore, but the other two were drowned. The Indian Barnaby, though only about 24, was one of the best canoemen on the river. He is described as an exceedingly fine fellow, and was the only support of his widowed mother and her family, who live in Arundel township.

Garden Party.

The garden party under the auspices of the Methodist Ladies' Aid on Monday evening could not be called a very great success. The weather was very unfavorable. A heavy thunderstorm about six o'clock caused everyone to give up hope of there being any gathering whatever, but the elements calmed down, people began to arrive, the gates were thrown open and when the audience had all arrived $30 had been added to the church treasury, which was not at all bad. Refreshments were served in Mr. J. W. Armstrong's residence, which had been kindly and freely thrown open to the visitors. The band was detained at Priceville by the storm but, believing that it is "better late than never," they put in an appearance about 9.30 and played several selections. Notwithstanding the dampness, everybody apparently enjoyed themselves, especially the young people, who kept up the sports until a late hour.

Irish Lake Picnic.

The annual Irish Lake Picnic was held this year in Mr. Jas. Buther's grove, on Wednesday of last week. The gathering was probably not quite so large as on former occasions, but everything was managed nicely and an enjoyable time was spent. The eatables were all that could be desired, and Mrs. Peter Neil, who engineered the culinary department, deserves much praise for the exellence of the repast provided. Dancing, of course, was the principal amusement, although there were several athletic competitions. Music was furnished by Flesherton's own inimitable orchestra, assisted by Mr. Jas. Henry, of Markdale, on an organ, and the splendid music was highly appreciated by officials and people. Among prominent gentlemen present we noticed Drs. Sproule, Ego, Jamieson and Hutton, J. G. Hunter, of Durham, and a number of others. Father Jefcott, of Orangeville, and Mr. Jas. Ryan of the same place, were also visitors. The gathering dispersed about 7 o'clock all having enjoyed a very pleasant afternoon. There was an almost entire absence of rowdyism. Prize winners in the games were as follows: Putting 21 lb. stone—1st R. Morrison, 2nd A. Morrison; hop step and jump 1st Jos. Blakely, 38 ft 2 in., 2nd D. McDonald, 36 ft. 9 in.; standing [illegible] 1st D. McDonald, 2nd J. Blakely; one hundred yard race 1st P. Hearn, D. Clark, 2nd R. Morrison;

Death of Wm. Wright

On Friday evening last, about 11 o'clock, there passed away in the village one of our old and much-respected residents, in the person of Mr William Wright, who, for thirty-nine years, has been a prominent figure in this section. Mr Wright was born in the year 1804 and came to this country from the county of Monaghan, Ireland, in the year 1850, settling on a farm about 14 miles from Flesherton, where he opened a general store, and subsequently removed to this village, where he carried on the business for a number of years. About five years ago, owing to financial difficulties, the business was given up, since which time, when health would permit, the deceased has been actively engaged in the stock shipping trade, and had been out driving on his round of business the day before death came. For two years Mr. Wright had been troubled with heart disease, and the approach of the dread messenger was therefore in a manner expected, for which the deceased gentleman was well prepared, having been a class leader and Sunday school worker in the Methodist Church for over twenty years. He leaves a widow and seven children, all of whom were present at the funeral excepting the eldest daughter, who was unavoidably detained in Chicago. The interment took place on Tuesday to Flesherton cemetery, and the remains were followed to the grave by one of the largest funerals ever seen here. Deceased was a member of the A. O. U. W., which lodged attended the funeral in a body, including representatives from the Markdale and Priceville lodges, and the A. O. U. W. burial service was read at the grave. Immediately after the interment an impressive funeral sermon was preached in the Methodist Church by the Rev. Mr. Shilton, from Luke 12:37: "Blessed are those servants whom when the Lord cometh finds watching." The church was crowded.

And thus passed away from life William Wright—a man who was respected by everyone, who helped make this country what it is, and who, above and better than all else, was prepared to hear the joyful summons, "well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, enter thou into the joy of the Lord."

Croup, whooping cough and Bronchitis immediately relieved by Shiloh's Cure. For sale at the Medical Hall.

Dominion Day in Priceville.

Priceville celebrated the natal day of our fair Dominion in a lavish manner with a magnificent list of sports and a big crowd. Flesherton vacated itself for the occasion and visited its sister town to assist her in the jubilee. There was foot racing, jumping, throwing stone, and other kindred games, but the greatest attractions were two baseball games, the first between Markdale and Priceville juniors, and the other between Priceville and Flesherton seniors. These matches attracted a large crowd of spectators, and Priceville won in each case. There were but five innings played by the junior clubs, when the score stood 8 to 9 in favor of Priceville's little sluggers, which was apparently very satisfactory to the majority, as the Markdale boys had in several instances almost reached manhood, and the Priceville boys ranged from 11 years to 15.

The second game—that between Flesherton and Priceville seniors, was noteworthy for some very poor, and also some brilliant playing. Taken on the whole Priceville played somewhat the best game, although several charming bits of work by Will Clark, Flesherton's pitcher, who knocked the ball over the fence while three men were on bases, thereby causing four runs to be piled up; Dave Anderson's lively protection of first base, and Williams's excellent catching redeemed our club from shame, owing to poor work in the field. Game was called on the seventh innings on account of rain, when the score stood as follows

Flesherton—2 0 1 1 2 6 1—13
Priceville—1 3 0 5 1 2 2—14

Watson's hall was open during the afternoon and evening, and notwithstanding the intense heat a large number tripped the light fantas. Flesherton's inimitable brass band furnished music on the grounds. A great many respectable looking individuals would not pay the ten cents admission, but gazed on the sports from over the fence. Such antics would lead one to believe that the looks were their only stock in trade. We cannot refrain from congratulating the energetic committee, composed of Dr. Hutton, J. Brown, J. McArthur, D. Lamount and John McGowan, upon the success which attended their efforts. The judges were C. McKinnon, A. McInnis, and D. K. McArthur

Character Development.

BY M. W. CAMPBELL, PUBLIC SCHOOL INSPECTOR FOR SOUTH GREY.

The school is a little Kingdom. It has its sovereign and its subjects. The sovereign is absolute but the subjects have rights. All the machinery of monarchy is there—laws, judge, jury, sheriff and even executioner. The kingdom is Lilliputian in its dimensions, but in it there is room for the exercise of the varied passions of humanity. Passion also is much as it is made by habit. The minds of children of school age are in the formative period. Their whole lives follow the bent now received. It is the age of growth, of expansion, of rapid development. It is a well-known fact that the impressions received in childhood and youth continue when those of manhood and middle age have passed away forever. So with the habits of youth. They form the guiding principles of life. This is universally believed. It has found expression in sayings like, "The boy is father of the man." "As is the youth so is the sire." The same doctrine is taught in the Sacred Record. "Train up a child in the way he should go and when he is old, he will not depart from it." The belief has found expression, also, in other ways. Why all the benevolent associations for reclaiming the abandoned, homeless children of our great cities? Why the extraordinary expenditure of money by every free country for the education of the young? Why, but that it is found cheaper to maintain institutions to educate the people than to suppress the vice and crime that naturally follow ignorance and superstition?

How important then, that in our schools the young should form and practice correct habits—habits of mind foremost and chiefly, but habits of body as well. The one is the result of the other. I would here enumerate a few of the virtues or qualities of mind which can be cultivated more effectively perhaps in the school room than anywhere else. I give them as they occur to me without any attempt at classification or indicating relative importance except in the case of the first. Loyalty to truth for its own sake, benevolence, self-control, self-denial, industry, kindness, justice, generosity. Others may easily be added but these underlie every true and noble character. Loyalty to truth I place first for I believe it to be the highest test of character—the most rare and difficult of all the moral qualities." "For such loyalty as it grows in perfection, asks courage and more of us, and sets before us a standard of manliness always rising higher and higher."

To bear witness to the truth against avowed and open enemies is easy enough. "But to bear it against those we love, against those whose judgment and opinions we respect, and defence or furtherance of that which approves itself as true to our own inmost conscience this is the last and abiding test of courage and manliness. How natural, nay, how inevitable it is, that we should fall into the habit of appreciating and judging things mainly by the standards in common use among those we respect and love. But these very standards are apt to break down with us when we are brought face to face with some question which takes us ever so little out of ourselves and our unusual moods. At such times we are driven to admit in our hearts that we, and those we respect and love have been looking at and judging things, not truthfully, and therefore not courageously and manfully, but conventionally. And then comes one of the most searching of all trials of courage and manliness, when a man or woman is called to stand by what approves itself to their consciences as true, and to protest for it through evil report and good report, against all discouragement and opposition from those they respect or love. The sense of antagonism instead of rest, of distrust and alienation instead of approval and sympathy which such times bring is a test which tries the very heart and reins, and it is one which meets us at all ages, and in all conditions of life." Emerson's hero is the man who, "taking both reputation and life in his hand, will with perfect urbanity dare the gibbet and die not by the absolute truth of his speech and rectitude of his behavior.

Without attempting a minute analysis of the way in which these several qualities of mind may be developed in the school-room, I would merely say that if the teacher himself possesses these qualities he will find many opportunities of directing the habits of his pupils, so that they too will ere long possess the same qualities. His own habits being fixed and good, his work will be to watch with jealous care until those also of his pupils become fixed and good. So far as he succeeds in this, so far is he successful in the best sense of the term, and so far as he fails in this so far does he fail to do the highest, the noblest, the most lasting part of the work that he has undertaken.

I shall now endeavor to answer the second question proposed:—What agencies are most potent for the development of a lofty character?

I am not now concerned with the further development of character in full grown men and women, but only with that in children during school life.

Starting from the general truth that it takes character to develop character I would place first, the Home influence on the pupils, but as that is beyond the limit of my subject I shall assume an average influence for good preponderating in the homes of our school children. So far then as the school is concerned, the first and most powerful agency in the building up of a true, noble and lofty character in the pupils is the teacher who is himself true and noble. In proof of this I shall merely quote a short paragraph from Fitch's Lectures on Teaching, a high authority on matters educational:—

"In regard to all the duties of life, there has to be considered the correlation between the thing to be done and the doer of it: the qualities of the agent largely determine the character and the results of the work. In all mechanical labor, in which matter alone has to be acted on, the physical strength and tactual skill of the artizan are the determining forces; but in the work and moral qualifications may have to do with the result. But in the case of the schoolmaster, as in that of the preacher, or of the statesman, moral character have to be the first; and it is found that in the long run nothing can influence character like character. You teach, not only by what you say and do, but very largely by what you are. Here there is a closer correspondence in this department of human labor than in others, between the quality of the work and the attributes of the workman. You cannot dissociate the two. And because in the profession of teaching, the ruler or agent comes into closer contact with the person ruled than in any other profession, it becomes here specially needful to see that we are not only what is the character of the work to be done, but what manner of men and women they should be who undertake to do it."

The second agency I would name is the free association or commingling of the pupils in the school.

This I consider has a most beneficial effect on the pupils. No doubt the influence is sometimes bad, and when bad is very bad. But with proper direction and supervision by a watchful teacher, the good effect on the pupils can scarcely be measured. What passion is not brought into play? What faculty of mind is not strengthened? Are there not abundant opportunities for repressing the evil propensities and of cultivating and encouraging the good? As no pupil can do as he pleases, but must submit to those restraints which regulate the school for the benefit of the whole, is he not thereby taught self-control—a prime factor in good character? As no pupil can get what he wants, but only what others get, if the teacher is truly impartial, is he not taught self-denial, and respect for the rights of others? As each pupil is generally treated by his fellow-pupils according to his deserts, is he not thereby forced in some measure to practice the golden rule "to do unto others as he would that others should do to him" until it becomes a habit and he does it from choice and no longer from compulsion. Thus, kindness to others is fostered and with it benevolence, generosity, and many other such qualities. And lastly, does not the emulation of the class room, the desire to excel, from whatever motive, lead the pupil to cultivate the habit of perseverence, the habit of work, until from the very habit a love of work, study, is begotten that will go with him through life and make him a useful member of society.

Here, I consider it not amiss to compare in few words the relative merits of public and private schools in character building. Although in our public schools, there is much that we must deplore, though the influences for evil are so much more active and widespread, though the moral tendencies of the pupils are more out of the control of the teacher, and evil habits are often learned which never find their way into private schools, yet, I maintain that, on the whole, they turn out better, more useful men and women than private institutions. To this of course there may be individual exceptions, but in general, I think it is true.

In the public school, the pupils are less held in by the leading strings of those in authority, and consequently they have greater opportunities of cultivating self-reliance and manliness—they are better fitted to cope with the oppositions, the difficulties, the perplexities of life—which every one must face sooner or later. Moreover, in the public school, class distinctions are well-nigh annihilated—impartiality should reign supreme in this little monarchy. All are so far as the public school is concerned, born free and equal and the foundation is laid on which can be built the superstructure of a well-ordered, well-governed democracy.

The atmosphere of a private school is certainly purer, fewer temptations assail the pupils; but this very fact, coupled with that other, that evil surrounds each one through life, weakens their claim to superiority in character building. For, clearly, in such institutions, where temptations are few, the pupils are without the experience of evil, are consequently less able to resist the evil, not knowing what it is. How often do we find in actual life, that the most innocent, those who have the least experience of the world, soonest fall, are by their very guilelessness easiest led from the path of rectitude and honor.

From this point of view, I would support very strongly the co-education of the sexes. The moral influence on the boys is of inestimable value. They are more careful of their speech, their manners, their every act when in the presence of the other sex. Whoever doubts this, let him witness some of the games practiced by our young men—base-ball for instance. In most cases, if no ladies are spectators or within hearing, loose rein is given to every form of vulgar speech and even act. On the other hand, when ladies are present, how [illegible] any profanity or obscenity checked! The chivalry of the young men is aroused. Their better selves are put on exhibition. What a mighty power the finer sex possesses! What a weighty responsibility for the improper or imperfect use of that power! It appears to me an almost irresistible force—a force that, if judiciously used, might be the strongest factor for reclaiming many of our young men from the destruction that lies at their door. For those evil habits that must sooner or later ensnare, are physical and moral ruin.

Here I agree with the girls, as of course, not so good, but backed as they are by a universal demand for greater purity, higher morals, there is not little danger that the impressions made will produce more than a feeling of disgust and a hatred of what is low and vile.

Col. Parker has a few sensible remarks about the common school system of the U.S. which will apply equally well to the public school system of Ontario.

"The common school system of the U.S. is an inspiration from God.

It says we will give every child the chance to work out God's design—the working out of character, for that is God's design—so that he can become the best possible that is in him.

The common school gives that chance. One of the greatest factors in the common schools is the social relation. Had the North known the South you could not have dragged them to war. The great power of the common school is this social intercourse. Yes, and the girls and the boys should be educated together: it is a crime to keep them apart half their lives and then bring them together. The mother should be educated as well as the father. * * *

It is character we must make in the schools; we will save millions of dollars by putting time and money into character. We must search for truth, for divine laws in humanity; they have not all been discovered. I fully believe that the millenium will come, not by any creed or catechism, but by the discovery and application of truth.

To conclude, I shall let Sir Thomas Bazley from Lord Beaconsfield's life of Lord George Bentinck, speak of those who in the society of the counting house are endeavoring to combine with their private success the highest standard of honor.

Such [illegible] duties and the character of teachers [illegible] I have found, have [illegible] unobtrusively, though perhaps observed by all in their blessed vocation wherever I have gone. * * * Their calling is high and holy; their labors the property of nations; their renown will rival the earth in after ages, in proportion as it sounds not far off in our own times. Each one of those great teachers of the world, possessing his soul in patience performs his appointed work; awaits in faith the fulfilment of the promises; and, resting from his labors, bequeathes his memory to the generation whom his works have blessed, and sleeps under the humble but not inglorious epitaph, commemorating "one in whom mankind lost a friend, and no man got rid of an enemy."

THE DR. CRONIN CASE.

Tracking Bloody Footprints—The Iceman May Squeal—Burke Identified in Winnipeg.

A last (Wednesday) night's Chicago despatch says: The special grand jury in the Cronin case gave its first indication of results at noon to-day in the shape of an indictment against Martin Burke on two counts. Burke, alias Martin Delaney, otherwise called Frank Williams, is indicted, first for murder, and secondly for conspiracy with Coughlin, P. O'Sullivan and Woodruff for the purpose of committing murder. Application will at once be made to Governor Fifer by an officer who is now in Springfield, for requisition papers for the extradition of Burke. These papers, properly attested, will be spread before the State Department of Washington, and the Secretary of State will make a formal request to the Canadian Government for the surrender and extradition of Burke. The indictment was returned upon the testimony of Michael Gavin, of the Chicago Sewer Department. Gavin testified that he had known Burke for a long time; that he had frequently heard the latter boast of his friendship with P. O'Sullivan and others of the suspected parties, and that on one occasion Burke had expressed his conviction that Cronin was an enemy, if not a traitor, to the Irish cause.

An entirely new Cronin suspect is being looked for to-night. His name is Michael Cooney, known as "The Fox," because of a song he used to sing. Cooney and Burke, it is claimed, actually killed Cronin. Both are Clan-na-Gael men. Cooney is a bricklayer and came from Ireland only a few years ago. Little hope is entertained of the immediate arrest of Cooney. State Attorney Longenecker allowed it to be inferred that he has two witnesses who will swear Cooney and Burke slept in the Carlson cottage several days prior to the tragedy, and were seen leaving the cottage on the fatal night. Both are said to have gone to a saloon and drank heavily.

When the Carlson cottage revealed its terrible story one of the most promising clues was the footprints in the paint. The murderer walked about in the paint in his stocking feet. A shoemaker wrote to the police that a well-known Irishman and Clan-na-Gael man, whose name he had seen in the newspapers in connection with the murder, was his customer, and had very peculiar feet. A piece of the floor was out out with three tracks on it and taken to police headquarters. Then the shoemaker was asked to produce the book in which he preserved the tracings showing the shape of his customers' feet. The outlines of the suspected Irishman's feet were found to correspond exactly in size and shape with the footprints taken from the floor. The peculiarity about the foot which made the paint tracks is the depth of the hollow part of it. In the paint tracks there is a great curve running in from the great toe to the heel, almost severing the latter from the front part of the foot. The board with the paint tracks on it and the measure book of the shoemaker have been in the Grand Jury room for several days. It is likely the suspect will be called before the jury.

It is reported the Grand Jury has obtained a complete list of the members of Camp No. 20, Clan-na-Gael, known as the Columbia Club, and has directed the subpœnaing of every member. It was from this camp that Cronin was expelled a couple of years ago on the charge of treason.

P. O'Sullivan, the iceman, indicted for complicity in the Cronin tragedy, was to-day removed to the "boys' department" of the jail, the recognized haven for "squealers." It is said he has offered to make a full confession. His motive is said to be fright over the arrest of Burke at Winnipeg and the disclosure that Cooney, "The Fox," is being actively pursued. It is suspected, however, that his removal is simply shrewd tactics on the part of the authorities to break down one or another of the suspects. It is reported that O'Sullivan at his own request had conferences with the sheriff and State's Attorney.

PARACHUTE ACCIDENT.

Prof. Williams, Who Performed in Hamilton Last Fall, Has a Narrow Escape.

A despatch from London (Eng.), dated yesterday, says: Prof. Williams, American aeronaut and parachutist, was announced to make an ascent from the grounds of the Alexandra Palace last evening and to descend in the usual manner by means of a parachute. The balloon having been inflated by the hot air system, Williams took a firm hold, and the balloon shot rapidly up to a great height. The spectators soon perceived something was wrong, and in a few minutes it became apparant that Williams was unable to detach the parachute from the balloon, which sailed at a considerable speed over Highgate. When last seen Williams was hanging from the balloon by his hands, and grave fears were entertained for his safety. Great excitement prevailed amongst the spectators. Williams held on to the balloon with his hands and drifted nearly five miles to Hornsey. There he descended, with the balloon and parachute together, on the top of the Local Board Offices. He was uninjured save for a few bruises.

Gold in Ontario.

A Winnipeg despatch says: It has all along been held by eminent and experienced mineralogists that gold in alluvial deposits should exist at the Lake of the Woods, on account of its geological character, it having been cut down by glaciers and depositing alluvial soil. Up to yesterday all attempts at discovery have been abortive, but this morning Prof. Harvey, of Toronto, reached Rat Portage from Yellow Girl Bay, where he has been prospecting on some mining locations which he, along with other Toronto capitalists, is interested in. Some of his men, it appears, brought in some "black sand" taken from the bed of a creek in the vicinity of the camp where they were located that he thought contained gold. This dirt was washed down until nothing remained but metal, which showed a large yield of gold. The test was repeated several times with most gratifying success, gold being found in the pan after each wash.

AN INVITED DOG-BITE.

A Man Bares His Arm to a Rabid Canine's Teeth in Acceptance of a $500 Offer to Test a Madstone—If This Madman Hadn't Done It, Another Was Ready.

A Kansas City, Mo., despatch says: The man who allowed himself to be bitten by a mad dog at the house of Dr. Edward N. Small, at Sedalia, is still alive and the madstone still clings to his arm. It is believed that the man was hardly less mad than the dog when he allowed the animal to bite him. Dr. Small is the chief surgeon of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway and is very sceptical as to the powers of the madstone. His joking offer to pay $500 to any man who would let a rabid dog bite him, in order to test the properties of the stone, was brought about by the fact that he had in his kennel several dogs which had gone mad or showed symptoms of doing so. In the course of some talk about these dogs he made the offer without the least idea that it would find a taker. When the man from Arkansas turned up to accept the offer Dr. Small promptly took water, not to save his $500, but to spare the man. The latter refused to be spared, however, and gaining admission to the dogs' quarters surreptitiously, he bared his arm to one of the brutes. The dog bit a piece out of the arm, and fifteen minutes later he died in horrible convulsions. It is feared the man will follow the dog's fate. Had not the Arkansan stolen the lead, A. L. Sherman, of this city, would have placed himself at Dr. Small's disposal. Mr. Sherman lives at 17 West Fifth street, and in expressing his willingness to submit to the painful test he declared that he was actuated only by a desire to benefit medical science. J. M. Dickson, also of this city, owns the madstone which Mr. Sherman proposed to use, and he, it is said, agreed, in case of the stone failing to work, to pay $5,000 to Mr. Sherman's heirs and a $1,000 forfeit to Dr. Small.

NOTES FROM MANITOBA.

Mr. Hugh Sutherland leaves about July 1st for the old country.

Ontario excursionists, to the number of 384, arrived at Port Arthur to-day, and will be here at noon to-morrow. Arrangements are being made for them to stop five hours at Griswold. Fifty teams were being engaged to drive them over the surrounding country. A picnic will be held at Hall's Grove.

G. Renfel, a wealthy Mennonite, of Gretna, imported two threshers and two engines from the States a few days ago. He paid $3,000 in cash for the machinery, besides paying $900 for duty and $140 for freight. After they arrived at their destination a local machine agent discovered that they had been made by convict labor across the line and reported it to the Government. The machines were seized and will be destroyed, as it is contrary to the laws of Canada to import anything from the States made by convict labor. It is rather hard on Mr. Renfel, as he knew nothing about the law in force, and will have to suffer the consequences without any recompense.

The annual session of the Methodist Conference opened in Grace Church at 9 o'clock this morning with a large attendance of delegates and ministers. Rev. W. L. Rutledge (Winnipeg) was elected President; Rev. A. Andrews, Secretary. The President read a list of transfers into and out of this Conference as transmitted by E. A. Stafford, Secretary of the Transfer Committee, as follows: Transfers into Manitoba Conference—Albert C. Crews, from Niagara Conference; John Stewart, from Montreal Conference; J. J. Leach, from Bay of Quinte Conference; J. A. Emslie and J. W. Sparling, from Montreal Conference; T. A. Oaten and R. Jamieson, from Toronto Conference; C. A. Procunier, from Niagara Conference; J. W. Runions and S. R. Brown, from Montreal Conference; John Tozeland, from Bay of Quinte Conference. Transfer from Manitoba Conference—J. A. Jackson, into Niagara Conference.

The Manitoba and Northwest Conference meets to-morrow. Rev. W. L. Rutledge will probably be elected President.

Surveyors are at work on the Canadian Pacific Railway extension from Barnsley to Carman. It is expected the road, which is only six miles long, will be built by the end of July.

Sparks from a passing engine caused a fire at Donald last week, which it was at one time feared would destroy the town. Happily the danger was averted by the energy of the Canadian Pacific workmen.

TO DRIVE AWAY THE DEVIL.

A Young Woman of Illinois Stuck Full of Pins to Cure Insanity.

A Carthage, Ill., despatch says A young woman named Hannah Heitland has been working for her brother in Quincy. She recently left his house and walked to her home in Tioga, a distance of 25 miles. She showed symptoms of insanity, and her parents, with other ignorant persons of the vicinity, held a sort of incantation over the girl, sticking pins into her person to "drive away the evil spirit."

The young woman became almost unconscious, and in this condition she was bound hand and foot, gagged, and placed in a farm waggon, brought to Carthage, and placed in a livery stable. Here she remained from noon yesterday until near midnight in an unconscious condition. The unfortunate creature was finally taken to jail, where a physician is trying to save her life. Pins are still found sticking to her person.

Keeping Up His Credit.

Young Wife—"My dear, you ought not to have purchased such a swell suit of clothes. It is entirely too costly for your income, and you certainly ought to know it."

Young Husband—"I got them on credit."

"Still worse."

"But I had to have them."

"What for?"

"To keep up my credit."

"The disease proceeds silently amid apparent health." That is what William Roberts, M.D., Physician to the Manchester Infirmary and Lunatic Hospital, Professor of Medicine in Owen's College, says in regard to Bright's disease. Is it necessary to give any further warning? If not use Warner's Safe Cure before your kidney malady becomes too far advanced.

A FRIGHTFUL EXPERIENCE.

How an Indiana Girl Lost and Regained Power of Speech.

Miss Sue Sutton, of Mount Carmer, Ill., 20 miles south of here, some months ago suddenly lost her power of speech. Her voice was gone and she could not utter a sound. The affliction baffled the aid of the physicians, who could not understand the case. Miss Sutton is a very pretty and accomplished young lady of 20 years of age. All other of her faculties were unimpaired, and she continued to go about her household duties, assisting her mother after the first shock produced by her affliction had passed off. Thursday her mother sent her out to dig some new potatoes. She went to the garden and stooped down and began to dig into the potato hills. Suddenly she felt a strange sensation and she straightened up. She found herself nearly paralyzed. Her arms were entirely so. Almost overcome with horror with what she believed to be a multiplication of her affliction, she managed to reach the house. As she entered, her mother said: "Have you got enough potatoes already?" and looked toward her for an answer, which the mother expected would be made by motion of her head, as the girl could not speak. The young lady stood as if rooted to the floor. She could not move a muscle. Her arms were drawn up, half bent, and totally paralyzed. The strange sensation increased, and for a minute or two she stood looking at her mother with a peculiar stare. Great drops of sweat stood out upon her, a tremor passed through her frame, and suddenly all was over and she replied in a strong voice, "Yes." To her great joy and astonishment her voice had returned, her strange nervous attack had passed away, and full use of her faculties had been suddenly and miraculously restored to her. Daughter and mother returned praise to that Supreme Giver of all gifts, and rejoiced that the strange affliction had been remedied.—Vincennes corr. St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

A Little Child's Presence of Mind.

Ralph Ball, a little fellow 5 years of age, is the hero of the day in Carbondale, Pa. Several children were playing around an unprotected well, when Eddie Widner decided to take a drink from it. As the water rises within a foot of the surface the little fellow thought he could reach it by lying on his stomach and putting his head down to the water, but in trying this feat he lost his balance and plunged head first into the spring, which is over six feet deep. In his fall he turned a complete somersault, coming up head first, but as he went down he uttered a cry that attracted the attention of a playmate, Ralph Ball, who is only 5 years of age. The latter hastened to the place, and, with a precocious presence of mind that would have deserted many an adult, he took in the situation at a glance, and, seizing the already half drowned boy, he held his head above the surface of the water until the united voices of the children drew a man who was working near by to the rescue. Eddie was restored to his parents rather the worse for his dangerous bath, but was soon completely resuscitated. —Chicago Times.

ALIVE IN THE COFFIN.

A Horrible Experience Undergone by a Minnesota Lawyer.

"It was horrible, horrible, sir; I lay in that coffin alive and just as conscious of what was going on around me as I am at this moment. I have always been of a hysterical temperament, and on one grievous occasion had lain in a cataleptic state for 24 hours. This last time I lay for three days, perfectly conscious, as I said before, but to all appearance as dead as Cæsar."

"It has been said," continued the hero of this blood-curdling adventure, "that there are infallible signs which denote death, and are unmistakable to the practiced eye of the medico. I deny that such is the case, and no one has had a better opportunity of judging than have I. When I died, or rather when three of the best known medical men in Boston had asserted that I was dead, I had been for three days previous to my supposed demise in a condition of violent hysteria, bordering almost on insanity, owing to the death of a sister whom I loved to distraction. At the expiration of that time I subsided into the condition I have previously described. My death was attributed by the learned disciples of Æsculapius to disease of the heart.

"The three old fogies held a consultation over me, and I heard them discuss the advisability of a post-mortem examination, there being a slight difference of opinion among them as to what was the actual cause. At this time I was lying on a board, perfectly rigid, and fully realized the fact that I should be buried alive if I could not brace up and explain matters within the next few hours. I immediately blessed my mother and brother for their refusal to allow those o'd butchers to go for me with their knive That's all that saved me, I tell you. This seems a wild story, but just the same it's a true one. Why, I can even remember laughing quietly to myself to think that the windows had been opened all around the room. It was devilish cold weather, too, but I could not feel the cold much. I knew, however, that those windows had been opened to prevent the decomposition of my ill-used frame. How did I get out of the fix? Well, it was just by the skin of my teeth. When the undertaker and his fool assistant brought the coffin and I was lifted into it, I knew at once that the coffin was too short, and just ached to say so, but I couldn't speak a work to save my life. I was tongue-tied, hadn't control of a muscle. The merest accident in the world prevented my being buried alive. I had been lying in the awful position I have described for over three days, when that beast of an undertaker came round again to screw up the lid.

"A tack had been left sticking out from the drapery gracing the interior of my sarcophagus, and the fellow in the coffin business commenced a series of vicious jabs at it with a sharp-edged screw-driver. On one of these occasions the instrument struck a nail-head and flying off at a tangent took me on the jaw with consider able force. The blood spurted forth and I instantly regained the use of my limbs. I wanted to knock seven kinds of blue fire out of the coffin-man, and was out of that in no time. The undertaker skipped, but I put it all over his assistant, I am ashamed to say, for the man was too horrified at my resurrection to defend himself in the least. Now you can just bet I am as healthy a man as the most of them nowadays, and I've issued strict orders that in the event of my death I am not to be buried until an artery has been opened and my decease absolutely proved."—St. Paul Globe.

PRAYER AGAINST OATH.

A Recorder Renders a Decision Worthy of Solomon Himself.

Recorder Price's court was the scene of an affecting incident in the trial of Duliss Chrisman for assault on his brother William. The brothers had quarrelled over William's desertion of his wife. William claimed that he was not married to the woman, although he had had two children by her, because they were divorced, and they were both Catholics. He testified that she kept a disorderly house in San Francisco, and wasn't fit custodian for her children. The woman wept and eagerly besought the judge not to believe his statement, saying: "I have raised my children as they should be brought up."

"Well," said His Honor, "I'll test it, madame," and he turned to the little girl, not more than 3 years old, who was clinging to her mother, and said: "You say your prayers."

Then ensued a most touching scene. The little girl climbed from her chair, knelt on the floor with policeman, judge, and her father and mother around her, and folding her tiny hands and lifting her eyes to Heaven, she made the grandest defence of a mother's word possible. Slowly, but distinctly, this child, born with the stain of shame upon her, and discarded by her father, lisped in childish accents the Lord's Prayer. As she proceeded, utterly oblivious of her surroundings, rough men who had not heard a prayer for years bowed their heads and many wept. Then the childish voice ended with "God bless papa, mamma, and Uncle Duliss. Amen."

The case was settled, and had William Chrisman sworn to a thousand oaths that his wife was bad he would have been disbelieved. It was several minutes before any one spoke, and then the Recorder fined the two brothers $15 each and dismissed court. —Fresno (Cal.) Despatch.

MARRYING HOUSEKEEPERS.

A Growing Preference for the Women Who Can Make Home Pleasant.

How did it come about? is a question now asked in regard to the marriage of a popular writer. The same question was asked five years ago when a society man in Boston married a sensible home body, some years his senior. The croakers croaked well, and decided that it was an unfortunate affair or would turn out to be in the end. George Eliot says that this love of "finding out how it came about" is due to "an excess of poetry or stupidity." I don't know as that is just fair, but I do think when a marriage is contrary to established rules, croakers are stupid and fortunately are often in the wrong in their prophecy. It is written that when a marriage was about to take place King James used to ask "What is the woman's makdom and her fairness?" The days of "infatuations" are now giving place to a keen outlook to the direction of personal comfort; makdom and fairness stand one side and the question to be answered first will this woman make my home restful to me, and will she live on what I can earn? Subtle has been the process that has led to this gradual change, but a change has come. The brilliant society man referred to is now a regular stay-at-home for the simple reason that his home is as perfect as a home can be made to be. The sunniest, brightest room in the house is his sanctum; here are his favorite books, pictures he likes, the latest magazines, leaves cut, and no end of pipes. When the train whistles into the depot, in which is this fortunate man, a fire is started on the low hearth to make the room cheerful although the warmth is not needed. To this room he brings his friends, and here husband and wife sit when alone. Every thing that will help his wife to make home a means of grace she reads; on her table are always to be found books and magazines that talk of the higher life of the home. I mean good cooking when I say higher life; a hitherto much neglected part of religion. This man, formerly out every evening, rarely goes to theatre or opera, party or ball, because his home has greater attractions, and he is really now so sensible, well-informed and amounting to something that his friends are rejoiced that the seemingly incongruous marriage came about. When I was asked what I considered the reason of this transformation, I answered: "Clean, well-aired rooms, good food, and a wife who is more anxious to be what a German writer calls 'a serene house-wife,' than to keep her weather-eye out to see if she will ever get her rights—and vote."—Good Housekeeping.

The Best Time for a Girl to Marry.

Probably the best time for the average civilized woman to marry would be any age between 24 and 36. It is not said that no woman should marry earlier or later than either of these ages; but youth and health and vigor are ordinarily at their highest perfection between these two periods. Very early marriages are seldom desirable for girls, and that for many reasons. The brain is immature, the reason is feeble, and the character is unformed. The considerations which would prompt a girl to marry at 17 would in many cases have very little weight with her at 24. At 17 she is a child, at 24 a woman. Where a girl has intelligent parents, the seven years between 17 and 24 are the period which both mind and body are most amenable to wise discipline, and best repay the thought and toil devoted to their development. Before 17 few girls have learnt to understand what life is, what discipline is, what duty is. They cannot value what is best, either in the father's wisdom or in the mother's tenderness. When married at that childish period they are like young recruits taken fresh from the farm and the workshop, and hurried off to a long campaign without any period of preliminary drill and training; or like a schoolboy removed from school to a curacy without being sent to the university or to a theological hall. Who can help grieving over a child-wife, especially if she have children, and a husband who is an inexperienced, and, possibly, exacting boy-man? The ardor of his love soon cools; the visionary bliss of her poetical imagination vanishes like the summer mist; there is nothing left but disappointment and wonder that what promised to be so beautiful and long a day should have clouded over almost before sunrise Hospital.

Bridal Etiquette.

A correspondent writes on this subject to the New York World: "A friend is to be married this month very quietly. He has requested me to act as best man. The ceremony is to be as simple as possible, only the contracting parties, their very near relatives, a friend of the lady to act as bridesmaid and myself in the capacity referred to, to be present on the occasion. Will you kindly inform me how I should deport myself under the circumstances and thus confer a favor on." And the editor replies: "With gentlemanly dignity. You should neither be too grave nor too gay. Don't turn handsprings, and on the other hand don't appear as if it were your turn next to view the corpse."

The man who attempts to beard the lion in his den is apt to have a close shave.

HOW THEY PAY THEIR CAR FARE.

Have you ever watched the warfare
Of two women over car fare?
Each aflame with generous feeling,
Depth of heart and purse revealing;
Each inspired with gentle horror
Lest the other should pay for her.
But take note—the more insistent
Of the combatants persistent,
She whose hand most promptly snatches
At her pocketbook's stiff catches,
She who murmurs: 'Don't be strange, dear;
It's all right; I've got the change, dear'—
She (though I am sad to say it)
Always lets the other pay it.

—This is the longest day.

A married woman has just begun suit against a prominent man in Ontario County, N.Y., for $200 damages for kissing her on the cheek last September. Her complaint does not say how she would have taken the tribute of affection had it been planted on her lips.

—Society has the yellow fever. Bridesmaids wear yellow tulle gowns, yellow roses, cream-colored hats, with yellow ostrich tips and yellow suede slippers. Black ebony cabinets are relieved with yellow Japanese bowls, or a drop lamp or pedestal burner of orange china, with trimmings of blackened iron. Palms in halls or doorways are grown in huge yellow vases, and in the king's blue candlestick burns a gilded yellow candle.

and so saved my own soul from eternal guilt and your life from ruin."

Then there was silence.

Suddenly a voice, close at hand, cried "Oh, Maud, won't you speak, even now?"

Crofton turned and saw Mrs. Gresham.

"You are both mad," she continued—"mad with jealousy and stubbornness and pride. Maud, if you'll not speak, I will."

"Perhaps your words may have some effect," Maud answered, in a slow, difficult tone. "Mr. Crofton has already told me that he would believe none of mine. Why should I speak?"

"And what could you say?" retorted he, bitterly.

"Be still!" exclaimed Mrs. Gresham. "You are each worse and more obstinate than the other! Maud was not false—not a coquette, Howard. You were right when you told her that, from the first, you made your love evident. But you were wrong otherwise. She did not scorn, but she prized it."

There was a sound from Crofton, half an expression of unbelief, half a sob. Maud's face was hidden.

"She prized it!" repeated Mrs. Gresham.

"Only the day before San Arpino came to Sorrento, your cousin, who has always hated Maud, told her that you had been as good as engaged for years. So Maud went as mad as you."

Howard Crofton was at Maud's side now.

"Can you forgive me? I do not deserve it, but if you only could!" he cried.

Maud did not stir.

"As for San Arpino," continued Mrs. Gresham, "he and Maud were never more than friends—warm, devoted friends. He loves a girl whom his mother detests, and Maud has been his confidante. Oh, you two mad people!" And she walked away.

"Maud, Maud!" groaned Crofton.

She looked up. Their eyes met. She let his eager arms enfold her. There was no need of pardon or explanation. That one glance had said all.

THE END.

Fanaticism Fitly Rebuked.

The Jews are good haters. If they are wronged, especially in a commercial or financial way, they generally succeed in making the wrong-doers repent in the end. Judge Hilton excluded them from his hotel at Manhattan Beach; in two years they had diverted trade enough from the great dry goods house of A. T. Stewart & Co., to which business Judge Hilton had succeeded, to wreck the custom, and the great concern closed its doors. There has been a crusade for years against Jews in Vienna. This has been one of the great corn markets of Europe, and Jewish capitalists control a large portion of the corn trade of the continent. The Jewish corn factors now stay away from Vienna, and the glory of the Vienna Corn Exchange has departed. There are various kinds of boycotting, and no one need be surprised when those boycotted retaliate with the same weapon when this is found practicable. This species of persecution, like most others, brings its revenges. Besides, indulgence in hatred of a whole people because of their race or religion or success in commercial or industrial pursuits is about as contemptible a business as poor humanity can engage in. Britain, France and the United States long since rose superior to the base sentiments which not infrequently still give rise to popular outbursts against the Jews in Germany, Russia and Austria, and in the former countries politics, the bar and commerce have been enriched by the great attainments of men of Jewish birth and descent.—Montreal Star.

The Doddies.

Recent foreign exchanges report the exportation of 100 head of pure-bred Aberdeen-Angus cattle, chiefly selected from the North of Scotland, to the Quebec quarantine station consigned to the Quorn ranche, Calgary, Alberta, Can., which is situated in that extensive range country lying north of Montana. The cattle are pronounced a very good lot, representing nearly all of the best-esteemed strains of the breed, and four of the six bulls—two from Ballindalloch and two from Balliol College farm—are highly bred. If these cattle give a good account of themselves in their Northwestern home it is quite likely that a new market will be opened for the breed. In this connection it is interesting to note that Clement Stephenson has recently sent from his well-known herd a small bunch of heifers to Russia. The "doddies," it appears, are becoming cosmopolitan in their distribution.

Mere Luck.

Mrs. Blinks (acidly)—Mr. Jinks began life as poor as you did, and now he's rich enough to buy you out a dozen times over.

Mr. Blinks (calmly)—Yes; Jinks is a lucky fellow.

"Huh! Luck! I don't believe luck had anything to do with it."

"Oh, yes; he told me himself that he owed everything to his luck in getting an economical wife."

DR. AUSTIN FLINT, late Professor in Bellevue Hospital Medical College, Fellow of New York Academy of Medicine, member of the State medical societies of New York, Virginia, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, etc., says, in speaking of Bright's disease, or advanced kidney disease, "The minor effects are headache, loss of vision, impaired hearing, involuntary muscular twitching, cramps, drowsiness, vomiting and diarrhœa." These are but some of the common symptoms of this malady, which accounts for Warner's Safe Cure curing so many diseases (so-called) which are not diseases, but are symptoms of advanced kidney disorders.

Convicted Beggar—Your Honor, couldn't you change my sentence of imprisonment into a fine? "No; that I cannot do. And where would you get the money, if I did?" "I could beg a little money every day till I had enough."

THE greatest snuff-taking country in the world is France, though it shows a decline in the habit. In 1869 the consumption was 13,000,000 pounds, or 7 ounces per head. Now it is 5 ounces.

THE authorities of Naples have decided to pull down 17,000 houses and rebuild entire districts of the city as a sanitary measure. King Humbert and Queen Margharita are earnestly supporting the movement.

A WORKINGMAN in a United States foundry has patented a method of casting pipes without sand moulds. In superheated steam or gas jacketted metal moulds pipes are cast which are uniform, sound and true, as if turned or bored in a lathe.

ASPHALT paving has been given a thorough trial in Buffalo. There are 53 miles of streets paved with it. So well satisfied are the people of that city of its durability and other advantages that they are expending $600,000 this year in adding to their asphalt roadways.

THE Yankee holds his own as an inventor. One person to every 820 of the population of Connecticut took out a patent last year. The other extreme was represented by North Carolina, to which only 55 patents were issued, an average of one to every 25,450 of the population.

MR. RITCHIE'S collection of early letters of Jane Welch Carlyle will contain, says the London Athenæum, in addition to Mrs. Carlyle's correspondence, eleven unpublished letters of Carlyle's, dealing chiefly with his preparatory studies for his projected "History of German Literature" and for his "Cromwell."

WHEN Red Cloud, the Sioux chief, said in his speech to the commissioners who are trying to buy the lands of his tribe in Dakota: "I looked around to see if you had any boxes full of money to pay us, but I see none; I presume you are to pay us in sugar talk, as you have done before," he showed that he was "on to" the Indian policy of the United States.

A PERSON with an eye to the future addresses an inquiry to a Boston scientific journal, anxiously asking what will be the fate of this earth. The editor in reply informs the man that the earth will undoubtedly fall into the sun. But, as if to prevent a panic, the editor considerately informs his readers that this catastrophe will hardly happen in their time, as it will not be due for some millions or billions of years.

THE venerable free trader, Mr. Villiers, is said to be the oldest member of the House of Commons. He was born in 1802, and is consequently in his 87th year. There is, however, a member of the House of Lords—also a staunch free trader—who is several years older than Mr. Villiers—Lord Teynham—who was born on May 27th, 1798, and is therefore 91 years old. Lord Teynham has just given evidence of his fidelity to the cause of free trade by sending £5 to the Cobden Club.

REV. DR. CUNNINGHAM, who succeeded Dr. Tulloch as Principal of St. Andrew's University, Scotland, is a man of marked individuality. A few years ago, when he was the pastor of a country church, he horrified old-fashioned Presbyterians by advising his congregation to take advantage of a dry Sunday to get in their crops instead of going to church. And in the General Assembly of the Established Church of Scotland, which was recently held in Edinburgh, he moved that the Apostle's Creed be dropped from a certain book of devotions.

Two commissions and three sub-commissions are still at work in Russia considering the Siberian Railroad project. There are two routes under discussion, the northern and the southern. The latter is practically a continuation of the Transcaspian Samarcand-Tashkend line through Semipalatinsk and along the Chinese frontier. The northern route, so it is unofficially said, has been selected, and work will be begun in 1890 from Tobolsk. By 1894 the line will be finished as far as Atchinsk, a distance of 2,090 versts. At the same time the line will be commenced at the other end, in the Ussouri district.

THE Northwestern Railroader puts forth a novel theory to account for an alleged increase of storms and floods in these latter years. It says that there are more than 30,000 locomotives in use in North America; and that the vapor from these sent out into the atmosphere each week will measure more than 50,000,000,000 cubic yards, which must be returned as rain, or 7,000,000,000 cubic yards a day—quite enough to produce rainfall every twenty-four hours. Other non-condensing steam engines add eight times as much more; so that the total mass of vapor discharged into the atmosphere must be each week more than 470,000,000,000 cubic yards.

THE late Drs. Gage and Burton, of Hartford, were both genial and fun-loving clergymen, and when the two met there was always a delightful passage of wit, as the following anecdote illustrates: One of Dr. Gage's lectures had proved to be less attractive than the others, and on its second repetition it had become a "chestnut" and did not "draw," and many left. When Dr. Gage was relating to Dr. Burton his experience with a burglar, he said: "Why, doctor, I had him down flat on his back—I held him there—he couldn't move an inch!" "What a splendid opportunity," retorted Dr. Burton, "that was, Gage, to have delivered to him your lecture on Palestine." There is a moral here for long-winded public speakers in every class of the community.

THE London correspondent of the Manchester Guardian hears that Mr. John Albert Bright will not take any action for some time to come with regard to the publication of his father's papers. As in the case of Lord Beaconsfield's papers, it is felt that inconveniences might arise if publication were to take place during the lifetime of Her Majesty or of Mr. Gladstone. The life of the late Lord Aberdeen, which has long been written and printed, will, it is said, continue to be withheld from the public so long as Her Majesty is alive. As regards Mr. Bright's papers, they are very voluminous and extremely interesting. Those who have been privileged to read his diaries describe them as written in that pure and nervous English of which Mr. Bright was so great a master.

SOME idea of the extent of Messrs. Krupps establishment for manufacturing implements of war may be gathered from a work just published at Essen, in Germany. It appears that in 1833 there were only nine workmen and in 1848 seventy-four. In July, 1888, the establishment employed 20,960 men, of whom 13,626 were at Essen. Including the families of the workmen they supported a population of 73,769 souls, of whom 24,193 lived in houses provided by the firm. There are at Essen 1,195 furnaces of various constructions, 286 boilers, 92 steam hammers of from 100 to 50,000 kilogrammes, 370 steam engines, with a total of 27,000 horse power; 1,724 different machines and 361 cranes. Of coal and coke 2,735 tons are used daily, and eleven high furnaces of the latest constructions produce nearly 600 tons of iron per day.

AFTER nine years passed in the rank of Major-General, the Duke of Connaught has been promoted a Lieutenant-General. His Royal Highness joined the Royal Engineers as lieutenant, June 19th, 1868; was transferred to the Royal Artillery, November 2nd, 1868, and to the Rifle Brigade, August 3rd, 1869. He took part in resisting the Fenian raid in Canada and was promoted captain in the Rifle Brigade, May 1st, 1871; joined the 7th Hussars, April 14th, 1874; became Major 7th Hussars, August 7th, 1875; Lieutenant-Colonel, Rifle Brigade, September 27th, 1876; and was promoted Major-General, May 29th, 1880. He served in the Egyptian war of 1882 in command of the 1st Brigade (the Guards), and was present at the battle of Tel-el-Kebir (mentioned in despatches, received the thanks of both Houses of Parliament, C. B., medal with clasp, second class of the Medjidie, and Khedive's star).

THE amateur engineers who are condemning in the press the Conemaugh dam because it was made of earth are pulled up sharply by the latest number of the Engineering and Building Record, which says:

> It is recognized as a well-established principle by hydraulic engineers that, for absolute safety and durability, an embankment of good earth, homogeneous throughout, and properly constructed, forms the best dam that can be used to impound a large volume of water.

It also says that, where the proper material is difficult to obtain, the area of the perfectly homogeneous mass may be reduced by the addition of less carefully selected material added merely for weight and mass. The central core is then styled a puddle wall, or the core may be made of masonry, but the cheapest and poorest style of this kind of work is a stone wall two or three feet thick with an embankment on each side of it, such a wall being rather a detriment to the stability of the dam than anything else.

HERE are sovereign remedies for obesity. If they are followed, the original slimness of the stout middle-aged man or woman will be regained without the aid of nostrums or quack doctors. It is foolish to begin by starving one's self; first, because the health suffers, and again because when the flesh is thus unnaturally reduced, wrinkles are at once visible and the complexion suffers. Exercise is an essential, the walk varying from three blocks to three miles a day, whenever the weather permits. If it is cold or rain, dumb-bells and pully-weights should be used for from half an hour to one hour and a half, if possible, before breakfast. Starches and sugars should be avoided, but one may eat as much meat, fat or lean, as much fish and as much butter as one likes. Never eat between meals, never drink water while eating. Take no milk, no potatoes, no beets, turnips, no parsnips, and as little bread as possible; as much salad, no dessert, except unsugared fruits, and no oat-meal. If these directions are followed the patient will lose flesh daily, but retain all his strength and vigor. In the meantime the woman patient should have a strict regard to common sense in her dress. One may add forty pounds to one's avoirdupoise by an inappropriate costume. One short woman in fifty realizes that if her clothes are too tight attention is attracted to her exact measurement. If she compresses her waist, the flesh goes to the bust or hips, and her nose becomes rosy and her cheeks pale. She should pay no attention to the prevailing style if that style accentuates her defects. She should wear union undergarments that are made in one piece from neck to heel; a simple waist with light bones instead of a corset; a long, plainly draped skirt, and a long, loose bodice, with unbroken, smooth flowing lines. The undergarments cannot fit too snugly, but the outer ones should conceal rather than expose the figure. The tight basque should never be worn. The princess robe is a direct inspiration for her succor. Slow walking adds to the flesh rather than diminishes it. It is a cruel prescription, but the stout woman must do her exercising at full tilt, bringing up in a perspiration. A Turkish bath once a week wonderfully expedites the thinning process.

A Dangerous Experiment.

Mudge—For Heaven's sake, Bosworth have you been sandbagged or in a railway accident?

Bosworth—Neither. I hid under the bed the other night to scare my wife.

Fits, convulsions, dizziness and headache are prevented and cured by using Warner's Safe Cure. Why? Dr. Owen Rees says: "The tenuity (watery condition) of the blood in Bright's disease produces cerebral symptoms, the serous (watery portion) is filtered through the blood vessels of the brain, causing anæmia and subsequent head symptoms." That is why these symptoms yield to Warner's Safe Cure. It gets rid of the Bright's disease and prevents the blood from becoming watery.

MR. O'HEA, a member of the English House of Commons, made a piteous appeal the other night to his fellow-members to lower the temperature, so that he could retain what is left of his hair. He said he had become bald and his beard had grown grey as a result of the infernal heat of the House.

CHANCES OF LIFE.

How They Vary as People Grow Older in Years.

These life insurance tables that show the expectation, the average, the probability of life are very curious and interesting, writes Bill Arp in the Atlanta Constitution. In a million births the males outnumber the females 22,000, but the girls don't die so fast, and by the time they reach 50 years the females begin to outnumber the men and outlive them. Nine thousand more women live to see 70 years than men, taking a million as the basis. Two thousand more women than men live to see 90. At 100 years there are 79 men to 144 women. The males start out most numerous, and this is right, for it gives every girl a fair chance for a lover and a husband—and it certainly was intended by a kind Providence that she should have one. She is entitled to one, and if I had my way I would make every old bachelor marry or support one. If he wouldn't marry according to nature, I would make him work for one. In youth and middle age the males outnumber the females, because it takes a good number to defend the country and do the fighting. But the old women outlive the old men because they are needed to nurse us and raise the grandchildren. They have no bad habits that shorten life. They do not drink, nor chew tobacco, nor smoke, nor expose themselves nor eat in a hurry. They take life calm and serene. One hundred and twenty-five thousand children are born every day. What a squalling and rejoicing if one could hear it all at once. Just think of it—45,000,000 of brand-new human beings in a year. But they don't stay long, not many of them. One-fourth of them die before they are 6 years old. While 125,000 are born in a day there are 100,000 funerals going on at the same time. What weeping and wailing, what grief and sorrow if we could hear and see it all. Verily the increase of the human family is mixed with great tribulations. Births and deaths, births and deaths, with the births only a little ahead, and sometimes, when war and pestilence and famine come, the death rate is ahead.

Wicked San Francisco.

"The people in California will gamble on anything—they will bet on anything from a cigarette to wheat field. Even the ladies bet. They will bet their diamonds on a horse race and their sealskin sacques on a dog fight, and pay them, too, if they lose.

"The people of San Francisco don't believe in hell," continued Mr. Jones, "but they have got more of it than any other people I ever saw. The way they are rushing to damnation reminds me of my dog. Once I was out walking, and my dog, a little fellow, was along. Suddenly a dog bigger than he was jumped out from a yard and scared him, and he ran the fastest, I thought, I had ever seen a dog run, and the other dog right after him. Directly a still bigger dog jumped up and ran after the dog that was chasing mine. You just ought to have seen that middle dog run.

"He was afraid the hind dog would catch the front dog, and he fairly flew. That's the way the San Francisco people live. They live faster than any other people on earth, and unless something stops them they are going to hell as fast as that middle dog was running."—From Sam Jones' Sermon at Atlanta.

Remedy for Sunstrokes.

Whatever is to be done in this disease must be done quickly. Clinical as well as experimental observations enforce this doctrine. There should in such cases be no waiting for the doctor. The remedy is so simple, the death so imminent, that the good Samaritan passing by should save his brother. The good Samaritan must, however, have a cool head to be useful. Not every man who falls unconscious on a hot day has sunstroke. There is fortunately one criterion so easy of application that any one can use it. Go at once to the fallen man, open his shirt bosom and lay the hand upon his chest; if the skin be cool, you may rest assured that whatever is the trouble, it is not sunstroke. If, on the contrary, the skin be burning hot, the case is certainly sunstroke, and no time should be lost. The patient should be carried to the nearest pump or hydrant, stripped to his waist, and bucketful after bucketful of cold water dashed over him until consciousness begins to return, or the intense heat of the surface decidedly abates.

About Bananas.

There is no such thing as a banana season now, so far as the local fruit men know. St. Louis is a heavy banana market, and formerly we used to have the bulk of fruit arrive in the early part of the spring. But now there seems to be a regular carrying trade from the West Indies to New Orleans, whence the bunches of fruit are shipped up the river, no matter whether the ice is just broken up, or whether the thermometer registers 100 in the shade. It is next to impossible to ship a ripe banana any such distance as it is necessary to be covered, as what escaped bruising and crushing would rot on the way. So the fruit is picked while quite green, and when it arrives sound and hard it is hung up in a sweating room, where it ripens in twenty-four hours in hot weather, and in three or four days in winter. Of course the flavor isn't quite up to that of fruit which ripens naturally, but the difference is not so great as might be imagined.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Smith's Wife.

When the day is o'er, and the evening is come,
The cattle are fed, the milking done,
Smith takes his rest 'neath the old shade tree,
From the labor of the land his thoughts are free

But his faithful wife, from sun to sun,
Takes her burden up that's never done;
There is no rest, there is no play,
For the good of the house she must work alway.

And in the end this faithful, overtasked woman will break down beneath her never ending round of work; and as she lies upon her couch of pain, Smith will have ample time to bemoan the selfish economy which closed his purse strings when his patient wife gently hinted that her failing health required a tonic. Why was he so short-sighted? Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription would have given her a new lease of life, and brought the blush of girlhood to her cheeks again. It is the only remedy for overworked, "worn-out" and feeble women generally. Sold by all druggists, under a positive guarantee of satisfaction in every case, or price ($1.00) promptly refunded.

SAND HEAPS.

Capital Things for Children to Amuse Themselves With.

I do not know of anything that yields so large a return for so little an expenditure as the sand gardens, writes a Boston correspondent of the Worcester Spy. The Massachusetts Emergency and Hygiene Association provided seven of these playgrounds for poor children last summer at a cost of $1 for each of the 400 little ones entertained for eight weeks. In Berlin the Government provides heaps of clean sea sand in the parks and squares, in which the German children play under the general care of the police. In Boston the ladies started the movement, the school committee gave the use of the school yards, the public contributed the money, and poor but reliable motherly women were employed four days in the week to matronize the little folks. It was a pretty sight to see these poor children, doomed to spend the summer in town, playing with shovels and pails in the sand, whose fascination was unending. Others were playing horse with worsted reins or tossing bean bags, skipping rope and playing ball. If a different set had come every day it is calculated that the matrons would have entertained almost 130,000 children. Now and then a basket of flowers would be contributed, so that each child went home with a nosegay. This season it is hoped the contributions will be sufficiently generous to establish 20 sand gardens and extend the benefits.

Consumption Curable.

Since the fact that consumption is both preventable and in its earliest stage curable, it has lost much of its terror. If the first symptoms are at once recognized, and the proper remedy applied, very few, if any one, need die of consumption, which is really lung scrofula. Like many other diseases this formidable one grows out of impure blood, and this, in turn, from a diseased liver. Hence we have the hacking cough, the pains in chest, the inflamed lungs, and all are symptoms of hastening consumption, all the result of depraved blood and a diseased liver. The use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery will arrest all such symptoms, restore the liver to healthy action, and send streams of pure blood into every organ. Of druggists.

How "Uncle Sam" Got His Name.

The term came into use in the war of 1812, and originated at Troy, N. Y. The Government inspector there was Samuel Wilson, universally known as Uncle Sam. Whenever he inspected supplies furnished the Government he would brand them U.S., meaning United States, but the abbreviation, being then new and not generally recognized, the workmen supposed it to be Uncle Sam, the inspector. Afterward the story got into print, and from that time the name has been facetiously applied to the United States.—Chicago News.

The Shoe & Leather Reporter, N. Y., and Shoe & Leather Review, Chicago, the leading trade papers of the U.S. in the Hide line, have sent their representatives to investigate Mr. Page's business, and after a thorough examination and comparison the Reporter gives him this endorsement

"We believe that in extent of light-weight raw material collected and carried, Mr. Page holds the lead of any competitor and that his present stock is the largest held by any house in this country."

And the Review says:

"After a most thorough investigation of Mr Page's business as compared with others in same line, we have become fully satisfied that in a specialty, light-weight stock, he is unquestionably the largest dealer in this country, while in superiority of quality he is confessedly at the head."

QUERY: If Mr. Page's business is the largest in its line in the United States, is it not the best possible proof of his ability to pay highest prices? If he did not do so, would he naturally get more Skins than any of his competitors in the same line?

Inistioge.

From our own Correspondent.

The Inistioge Sunday School will hold their annual picnic in Mr. Jordon's [illegible] grove on the afternoon of Wednesday 31 [illegible] inst.

The frame of Mr. John Letts' barn was raised on Friday evening last.

The stone masons have completed the stone work of Mr. John Talbots barn.

Mr. Wm. Little, of Owen Sound, who has been visiting Mr. Geo. Moore, left for home on Monday, the 1st inst.

Mrs. Scott, of Angus, who has been visiting friends and relations in this locality, left for home on Saturday last.

Mr. Josiah Roscborough, of the Owen Sound Collegiate Institute, is home on a visit.

The Salvation Army band from Owen Sound passed through here en route to Dundalk on Sunday last to celebrate Dominion Day. Some of their horses seemed to be terribly strapped.

Notwithstanding the wet weather that we experienced during the month of June, the crops have a very favorable appearance.

The members of the Inistiogo Division of the Sons of Temperance will attend church in a body on Sunday, July 14th, when a sermon will be preached especially, by the Rev. Mr. Moss of Dundalk. The following are the names of the officers who are elected to serve the division for the ensuing quarter: Mr. E. Cross, W. P.; Miss H. Armstrong, W. A.; Mr. R. Waters, R. S.; Miss E. Bannon, A. S.; Mr. Wm. Hutchinson, F. S.; Miss A Bannon, Treasurer; Mr. Geo. Bannon, Chaplain; Mr. Jno. Hutchinson, Conductor; Miss E. Acheson, A. C.; Mr. A. McCauley, I. S.; Mr. R. Acheson, O. S.; Mr. Wm. The Misses Mayhew returned to their home in Port Hope last week.

[illegible] evening being the [illegible] the administration of the [illegible] Lord's Supper, [illegible] of a novel but very solemn character occurred within the church. During an elaborate sermon which was being delivered by the Rev. A. McDonald, B.A., and while dwelling with much emphasis upon the unspotted life of Jesus Christ during His sojourn upon earth, whose dying love they were assembled to commemorate, a dove entered the church by one of the back doors and rested on a lamp near the pulpit. One of the elders carefully removed her, but soon afterwards she occupied a more elevated position at the south end of the church. After having taken a careful survey of a large audience, and probably wishing to change her position in order to become more conspicuously attractive, she flew in the direction of the preacher and perched herself on his Reverend head, uttering language quite familiar to her species, but totally unintelligible to the congregation. She was again removed contrary to her inclinations, which she manifested by her subsequent attempts to re-enter the sacred edifice. We are glad to observe that the congregation viewed the unique scene in a manner which did not in the least degree detract from the solemnity of the occasion.—[Collingwood Enterprise.

Hon. John Norquay, ex-Premier of Manitoba, died suddenly in Winnipeg Friday night, aged 47. He was a very large man—weighing nearly 300 pounds—and his death is attributed to heart disease. He was of Scotch and Indian parentage, a native of the Red River district, and has been connected with the public affairs of Manitoba since 1871, holding office during the greater portion of that time. He was a Conservative, and was on several occasions very successful in obtaining better terms from the Dominion for Manitoba. Fatally he was left-ed by Mr. Greenway, who headed the anti-disallowance of railways party. Mr. Norquay was a man of marked ability, an excellent speaker and an expert in financial matters. His death leaves the Manitoban Government without its premier.—Hamilton Times.

Correspondence to The Advance.

Last Friday afternoon a number of the friends of Mr. and Mrs. Melvin paid them an unexpected visit at their residence on Mr. Buchanan's farm, Meaford Road. The old couple were exceedingly glad to see "sae many kint faces." The time passed quickly and pleasantly. About half past four the ladies of the company took possession and soon the large table was "groaning" with the most choice viands. Shortly after ten the horses were hitched for the return journey and soon the visitors left in the full assurance that their visit had gladdened the hearts of this aged couple, whose time here is fast drawing to a [illegible] Mr. Melvin is in his 86th year and his good wife is just six years younger. On Monday morning early, in her 82nd year and surrounded by her family, "Grandma" Pedlar passed quietly away to her rest.

All night we watched the ebbing life,
As it its flight to stay,
Till as the morning hour came on,
Our last hope passed away.

Each flutter of the pulse we marked,
Each quiver of the eye,
To her dear ips our ear we laid,
To catch the last long sigh.

At last the fluttering pulse stood still,
The death-frosts through the clay
Stole slowly, and as mourn drew on
Our loved one passed away.

THE CROP PROSPECTS.

Home and Abroad Appearances at the Present Time—Decidedly Above the Average in Canada.

An Ottawa despatch says: Crop reports from sixty district correspondents in Ontario show reason for gratification at the prospects. All speak of the excess of rain doing much damage on the lowlands, but in spite of this the crops are, on the whole, nearly everywhere pronounced decidedly above the average. Grain is doing splendidly. Wheat, oats and rye are all far better than usual. Barley is good, peas excellent and most of the root crops are doing well. Potatoes, however, are seriously damaged by the wet, and so is corn. Hay is scarcely up to the average and fruit is considerably injured. Further heavy rains will injure the whole harvest seriously, but, on the other hand, average fine weather now will give far more abundant harvest than usual.

A cablegram gives information as to the present condition of the European crops, from which it would appear that recent statements as to the extent of damage have very little foundation. Great Britain, France, Germany and Italy appear, as regards the crop outlook, to be in a highly satisfactory condition. Austria-Hungary and Hungary moderately so; while in Russia the latest estimate is that the wheat crop has been damaged to the extent of 25 per. cent. by drought.

SWORN BY A ROOSTER'S BLOOD.

The Strange Oath Taken by a Chinese Witness in Philadelphia.

A Philadelphia despatch says: A strange scene was presented in Judge Bregy's Court when the most solemn of Chinese oaths was administered to Lee Bang, a celestial witness. A rooster was brought into court and set down beside the witness-stand, where a square of muslin had been placed. Candles and joss sticks were lighted in a cuspidor. The witness then cut off the rooster's head and signed with a quill dipped in the dead bird's blood the paper from which the oath had been read to him. The paper was then burned in the cuspidor.

"Is this the form of oath administered in the courts of justice in China?" asked Judge Bregy. "Not particularly," replied Interpreter Chew. "The Chinese courts do not use any oath to my knowledge. I have been in America for a long time. When I was in Portland, Ore., the killing of a rooster was resorted to as the only thing to prevent a Chinaman from lying. Before that you couldn't get at the truth."

"What is the reason for the solemnity of this oath?"

"They believe that everything has a spirit, good or evil, and after a Chinaman cuts off a rooster's head, he believes that the spirit will trouble him if he tells a lie."

How One Burglar Was Caught.

The Irish (heaven bless 'em) have a little invention which has been used in Ireland with great success. It would be a good attachment for the ballot-boxes in this country. An enterprising burglar entered a gentleman's house at Waterford, Ireland, one night a couple of weeks ago, and, after purloining everything he could find, he prepared to remove a large photographic camera that was standing on a table. In some way he touched off a magnesium flash light attachment that was part of the machine and fled precipitately when the thing flared up. The next day it was discovered that the camera had taken the photograph of the burglar. The negative was placed in the hands of the police and by its aid they quickly nabbed their man. It showed the burglar with a jimmy in one hand and a box containing jewelery under his arm, while he carried a sack over his shoulder with valuable pieces of plate, books, etc., and was gazing at the flash light in open-mouthed amazement. This was the unimpeachable evidence of a mechanical eye-witness and the fellow was sent up for six months.—Manchester Courier.

MORE SCOTCH ASCENDENCY.

The Earl of Fife to Marry the Prince of Wales' Eldest Daughter.

A London cable says: There was but one topic of discussion in the clubs last evening. It was the betrothal of Princess Louise Victoria Alexandra Dagmar of Wales, the eldest daughter of the Prince and Princess of Wales, to Earl Fife. Rumor for a long time past has been busy in clubdom with the possibility of such a match, and what gave particular strength to the possibilities of such an alliance lay in the fact that the report was most credited by those about the Prince. Yesterday afternoon the Queen formally gave her consent to the union. The Prince of Wales is the most popular gentleman in the United Kingdom, and the Princess alone vies with him in the affections of the people. When it became known that the hand of their eldest daughter was to be conferred upon one of the most popular Peers in the United Kingdom, the Prince and Princess of Wales were simply and purely raised into the position of popular idolatry.

Princess Louise has in her short career won universal popularity. Like all the royal princesses she has always been troubled with shyness, but not more so than might be expected from young ladies not long out in the world; but those who have penetrated the veil of modesty surrounding her have found in her charming womanly nature a fund of intelligence and a good share of her mother's remarkable charm of manner and interesting gentle nature. She has a very pretty figure. She is about middle size and has a face with plenty of character. She was born at Marlborough House, February 20th, 1867. Earl Fife has been for many years a close friend of the Prince and Princess. Everybody knows him and knows well of him. He is an exemplary model of the British aristocracy. He is the sixth Earl of Fife, but was created a peer of the United Kingdom in 1885. He is 40 years of age.

A Remarkable Case of Somnambulism.

A policeman early this morning found a woman, attired only in her nightclothes, wandering aimlessly along by the side of St. Mary's Hospital. When the officer spoke to the woman he found that she was sound asleep, and when awakened she went into a nervous condition and was taken into the hospital. She gave the name of Mrs. Annie Davis, and said she lived at No. 831 Park avenue. The police of the 13th Precinct were notified to investigate the case. They found that the woman's husband had gone to his day's labors apparently undisturbed by his wife's escapade. The neighbors state that Mrs. Davis is a somnambulist of extraordinary quality, and her antics have long since ceased to be cause for wonder among the inhabitants of the tenements along Park avenue. She is in the habit, they say, of getting up in the middle of the night and while sound asleep will go through part of the work that is to be done the next day. Breakfast is sometimes prepared at 1 o'clock in the morning, and in a sound sleep the woman will do all the usual little odds and ends of her household duties without making a mistake, even to lighting a fire in the kitchen stove. Once or twice the woman has endangered her life by wandering on the roof top and lying down close to its edge. After Mrs. Davis had recovered from her nervous condition she was sent to her home.—Brooklyn Times.

Mistakes.

It is not disgraceful to make a mistake. Those who never make mistakes never do anything worth mentioning. The attitude of men with reference to their mistakes is sometimes disgraceful. One who cannot see his own errors even when they are pointed out will not make much improvements. Until we discover and deplore our defects we will not take pains to remedy them. Frankness in confessing faults is a great grace. When one becomes so perfect in his own estimation that he has no occasion to confess his faults to his neighbors, he is well nigh beyond the reach of hope. A Christian who believed that his holiness had reached the point of faultlessness once gave way to a violent fit of temper, and when forced to apologize told his story well enough until he came to the conclusion, and then spoiled it by saying: "I cannot tell what made me use such language; I think I must have been inspired; I am sure I was not angry." "Who can understand his errors?"

Rare Forethought.

"Harry," exclaimed the blushing Laura, "this declaration is so sudden that I—that that I hardly know what to say. I was unprepared for it. It unnerves me."

"I was afraid it might," said the young druggist, rising with alacrity from his knees, "and I brought along a bottle of my unrivalled nerve anodyne. This preparation, darling," he added, soothingly, as he took a bottle from his pocket, quickly extracted the cork, and poured a quantity of the medicine into a spoon he had also brought along, "will allay any undue excitement, quiet the nerves, aid digestion, and restore lost appetite. I sell it at 60 cents a bottle. This is the dose for an adult. Take it, dearest."

SHORT BUT SWIFT.

Rev. R. T. Burns Gets Justice Tempered With Mercy.

A last (Wednesday) night's Kingston despatch says: This morning Rev. R. T. Burns, Deputy Postmaster, was brought before Judge Price. He tottered like a child when asked to stand up. The Judge told him he had been charged with appropriating money belonging to Mrs. Love, and asked, "Are you willing to be tried before me or a jury?" Mr. Burns said, "You." Mr. Britton, Q. C., read a lengthy charge, then he asked if Mr. Burns was ready for trial. The reply being "yes," Mr. Burns was asked to plead, and said, "I am guilty." Mr. McIntyre then addressed the Judge, stating that the case was the most distressing that had ever come before him. The respectable position which the prisoner had occupied for many years constituted an element in the deplorable nature of the case. His Honor was aware of the terrible calamity which befell the prisoner when two promising sons met watery graves. (Here the prisoner wept aloud). Another distressing element was the position in which his family was placed. When the charge was brought to the prisoner's knowledge on Sunday he had time to leave the country, but instead he went to the Inspector's office and gave himself up until the papers in the case were made out and he placed in safe keeping. Further, the prisoner's family, notwithstanding that it had been suggested to him to leave the country, decided to place no difficulty in the way of justice taking its course. Mr. McIntyre referred to the time of life the prisoner had arrived at, to the fact that there was absolute ruin for him and his family, and said he believed he had grounds for asking the Judge to be as lenient as the law allowed. Judge Price said this was the saddest case he had ever had to deal with, and, considering the position which the prisoner had left and the trying circumstances he had passed through in losing two sons, he felt justified in making the limit of imprisonment as low as the law allowed. "Therefore," said the Judge, "I will sentence you to the penitentiary for two years." The prisoner felt relieved; evidently he had expected a much longer term.

SAND SPOUT IN THE DESERT.

Graphic Description of a Striking Scene in Africa—Moving Columns.

Under the fairest skies the desert is an awesome solitude, but when a storm comes it is terrible and appalling. I shall never forget a scene I witnessed some forty miles beyond the great pyramids, says a writer in the New York Mail and Express. I had gained an isolated hillock, some two hundred feet above the level of the surrounding desert. Away to the west, about two miles distant, I descried six or seven lofty pillars of sand moving swiftly over the undulating plain. The centre one of these was vertical, and those surrounding it, at a distance of two or three hundred yards, leaned slightly toward it. The sand at the base of the columns was lashed by the furious whirlwind into a surging sea. Desert trees of the hardest wood were torn up with their roots and hurled hundreds of yards away and high up into the air; even the grass that grew in the path of that terrible storm was shorn clean away from its roots. The summits of those columns of sand at length joined, and then burst forth from their united tops a yellow gigantic cloud of sand of such magnitude and density as to darken, as in a total eclipse, the face of the bright afternoon sun. The sand spout, called by the natives "zobahah," shortly after subsided, but the cloud of sand and grass, which had been raised high in the heavens, continued to darken the setting sun for more than an hour. The smaller column behind travelled swiftly, increasing in size, until it reached the site of the break-up of the other, and then added its mite to the universal destruction. With my sextant, as I stood in security, I measured the height of the centre column of sand; it was nearly one thousand feet. The other columns were rising so rapidly that they soon reached a greater height than that of the centre column. When the junction of them all took place the sudden eruption of sand, leaves and grass reached to a total height of over four thousand feet. These "zobahahs" are not very frequent, but when they occur they carry widespread devastation along with them, and woe betide the traveller and the tent that happen to stand in their way. Not more than ten yards from the column the air is perfectly calm, but within the small circumscribing circle there rages such a tempest as will carry away anything, however firmly fixed in the ground, into the regions of the upper air as easily as an ordinary gust of wind will blow a piece of paper. The camel, this wonderful ship of the desert, always knows a few hours before whether one of those approaching "zobahahs" is likely to come upon him, and his natural instinct will guide him to a place of safety, where he lies down and only breathes the cool reactive current which closely follows the burning, almost suffocating, hot air which accompanies the "zobahahs." The usual movement of these sand spouts is in the arc of a wide circle, and the direction of the centre of the circle is almost invariably from north to south.

When these awful turmoils are over, and the disturbing elements have resumed their normal state, the burning sand becomes saturated with a heavy dew, the sun is less angry, and the African desert more amenable to life in both man and beasts. Nature's wisdom and wonders are indeed beyond man's limited understanding.

The Manchester Ship Canal.

Some interesting statistics were lately given by Ald. Bailey, one of the directors, with reference to the progress of this work. He stated that 15½ million tons of earth and rock had been excavated, and that 28,000,000 tons more remained to be removed. It was anticipated that the work would be finished in two years from 1st of January next. There were on the works 183 pumping engines, 82 steam navvies, 5,000 waggons, 158 locomotives and 116 steam cranes, and in a few months 15,000 men would be employed. He further gave some particulars as to the cost of haulage of one ton, which was stated to be 6d. per mile on the highways, 2d. on the railways, 1-66d. per mile on the Leeds and Liverpool Canal, 1-116d. per mile on the Aire and Calder Navigation, and between New York and Liverpool about 1-300d. per mile.
